23-29. Under the Law, Subjection; under Faith, Sonship. "The Law was a regime of supervision. Before Christianity came we were under jurisdiction, confined like prisoners, with only one prospect of escape, the faith that was due for revelation. The Law has been a kind of guardian-tutor exercising a preparatory oversight only: the ultimate purpose was that by faith we should find acceptance with God. That faith is ours now: we are done with tutors; we have reached our spiritual majority, recognized in virtue of faith as sons in God's house, in the fellowship of Christ. All of you, Jews and Gentiles alike, are God's children in the fellowship of Christ by faith. All of you who were baptized into Christ adopt the Christ attitudes. There are no distinctions in Christianity—of race or class or sex. You are all one-and-the-same in Christ, and, as you are Christ's, you are already acknowledged as the true descendants of Abraham, his heirs as the promise specified, under no obligation to establish that claim by observing the Law as those Judaizers insist."

23. The faith as used here means almost "Christianity," the dispensation which required simply faith.

24-26. The paidagogos (tutor) was a male slave who took general charge over growing boys between the ages of six and sixteen. He did not merely bring the boy to school but kept him from evil courses. He was the symbol of minority age and immaturity. The Law, then, was not what finished off religious development as the Judaizers had claimed; on the contrary it covered our undeveloped stage: it was a moral caretaker that we outgrew. The point of the comparison is not that the Law brought us to the school of Christ: Christ the school-master is an utterly inappropriate image; rules and regulations hold in school, but the mark of the Christian life is the freedom of a son in the house. The analogy lies in the temporary character of the tutor's rule, the irksome supervision he imposed like the Law. Confinement and restriction make a boy long for freedom. Christianity with its faith-relationship marks the real stage of maturity, that perfection of religion that had been wrongly identified with Jewish legalism.

27. At baptism we are "invested" with Christ. In the mystery faiths a robe was donned by the initiate, but here the reference is, rather, to the putting on of some garment on reaching maturity. The actor put on a robe. The robe at least signifies a new character and set of relationships, a higher form of manhood. It brings with it a more liberal outlook, an ability to transcend distinctions of race and class and sex. This linking of higher human qualities with the rite of baptism shows that Paul has no magical conception of baptism. Faith is the kernel of religious life to him, and that means the inward ethical spiritual urge is everything (cf. 1 Cor. 10¹⁻¹²).

28. This loftier humanity to which we attain through Christ does not abolish distinctions but, rather, enables us to rise above them. The effect of Christianity has been to undermine the distinctions and work toward their abolition, e.g., slavery. Its method is not to overturn the constitution of society but to leaven humanity with this new spirit so that society changes itself. Paul saw Christianity drawing together into one fellowship all sorts and conditions of men. In Christ Jesus all racial differences and class prejudices dropped out of view. Men found something in common in Christ—a single higher level of personality.

29. We are Christ's in the sense that we are members of his: he is our representative. And in virtue of this membership in him we come to inherit the blessing that was promised, the kingdom of God. Christ's people enjoy his status. This determination of Paul to retain Abraham for Christianity reminds us how much Christianity drew from the O.T. It thus linked itself with the faith of the saints and sought not to destroy but to fulfill. Its policy in the mission field is still the same—to carry forward the earlier strivings of men to the higher and richer revelation in Christ. It has a right to inherit all religions because it has the kernel truth beneath all religion, the faith attitude that accepts the Father and the Father's purposes with childlike trust.

CHAPTER IV

1-7. The Fullness of the Time. The analogy suggests another point. "An heir is legally an infant, without rights, till he enters on his inheritance. We too had our time of religious tutelage under the elemental world-powers. But God's time matured for establishing a more liberal regime through his Son and the Spirit. (1) Jesus was born into the world-order under the reign of the Law to 'buy out' (redeem) those who lived under that slavery and secure for them the status of sons. (2) In view of your position as sons he endowed you with the spirit of his Son: it is that that teaches you to acknowledge God as Father. You rank now as sons, not as slaves: any more, and heirs—all by God's doing."

It is not clear to what legal practice Paul refers. "We have no knowledge of a guardianship the period of which is fixed by the father" (Burton, Galatians, p. 214). The time of coming of age was usually fixed legally but some latitude may have been given the father about details. The tutor, or guardian (epitropos), had general charge of the child; the curator, or steward (oikonomos), looked after property and business affairs. Under Roman law the minor was under his tutor till the fourteenth year, and thereafter under the curator till the twenty-fifth. The father could appoint only the tutor, not the curator.

3. Under we Paul must include the Jews who had traduced him as well as the Gentiles. It was cutting them to the quick first to describe as slavery the Law on which they so plumed themselves and then to include them together with the Gentiles as equally under tutelage—babes in religion.

Rudiments was applied to (1) the letters of the alphabet, (2) elementary principles, (3) primary elements of the physical world of earth, air, water, (4) angelic beings who were believed to preside over the elements.

Under (2) "the undeveloped principles of religion" would be an apt description of the Law, and this same phrase is linked in Col. 28, 20-22 (notes) with "traditions and commandments," also apt definition of the Law. Rudiments of the world, however, is a clumsy expression for the Law. Under (3) the meaning would be "enslaved under the material things of the world," i.e., outward ceremonies, etc. Under (4) the most satisfactory sense is obtainable. There was positive fear of the stars and star-spirits as uncanny influences. It was, as the word here suggests, a real enslavement to be under them. In v. 9 there is the hint that these Galatians had taken specially to days and seasons, festivals which were fixed according to the movement of the heavenly bodies. Angel-worship was also a feature of the Colossian heresy (Col. 218), and in 320 Paul quotes the idea that the Law was given by angels. These, then, would be the guardians and stewards (or overseers) of Jews and Gentiles alike. It must have wounded Jewish vanity to have their usages and feasts lumped together with the pagan rites and festivals that they despised.

4. According to Paul's view, Christ was uniquely related to God in that he inaugurated this new regime. He divided the old order from the new creation. Clearly, he is here regarded as a divine figure, sent forth into humanity, born of woman, subjected to a life of earthly conditions such as the Law, and specially associated with the gift of the Spirit. His function was to redeem us out of the bondage of the Law—which he achieved by accepting its conditions and completing its demand and canceling it. In Roman law, in adopting a son a man made a fictitious purchase from the child's own father.

The fullness of the time, i.e., the world's history was all articulated and predestined stage by stage according to the hidden counsels of God. (Cf. Paul's speech at Pisidian Antioch, Acts 13^{16f.}; Ramsay, Galatians, p. 399.)

5. Jews require adoption as well as pagans. The characteristic note of the Christian faith is to know God as Father—the supremely intimate name that Jesus made his own. (Cf. C. G. Montefiore, The O.T. and After, pp. 204, 205.) The form of address Abba (= Father) was evidently established in the early church.

8-11. A Pitiful Relapse. To think that the Galatians should lapse from a faith so high and spiritual, and turn back to the poor flabby stuff of paganism! More in sorrow than in anger Paul makes his reproach. These old gods of theirs were not real gods. He does not deny their existence, but he denies their divine nature: they were demons, not gods. It is incomprehensible in those who had once come to know the true God, or, rather—for it was presumptuous to ascribe initiative or achievement in such knowledge to men—in those of whom God had graciously taken cognizance and to whom he had communicated his saving truth. It was fundamental to Paul's faith that God did everything: religion was his gift. God broke in upon his life, simply arrested him, on the Damascus road, and he interprets all religious experience in the light of his own (cf. Phil. 3¹² 1 Cor. 8³ 1 Cor. 13). How can converts of his continue to lapse back to a superstitious worship of the uncanny powers of the elements? These deities had nothing of the might and grace of God, no strength to give, no power to save, no rich depth of nature to satisfy religious men. Actually to want to return to such bondage!—to a slavish round of sacred and festival days.

The external observances of Judaism—the Sabbath laws, festivals, etc.—had been introduced to the Galatians. The circumcision party regarded these as the ornaments of their faith. Paul here classes them with the pagan celebrations which the Jew scorned as orgies and superstitious rites. Back in Jewish legalistic ritual, they are back again at the level of their old paganism. Actually Paul was not far wrong. While these Jewish feasts had been ethicized and associated with great religious events in the history of Israel, they originated in pagan nature-worship; e.g., the Passover ran into the Feast of Unleavened Bread which marked the return of spring and the new crops, the Feast of Tabernacles retains features of the Feast of Ingathering as shown by the harvest decorations of the synagogue. (Cf. Oesterley and Box, Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, pp. 384f.) In the same way our saints' days take over ancient pagan ritual; e.g., casting pennies into a sacred well and hanging rags on neighboring bushes, as is done in the Highlands of Scotland to-day.

10. Days would refer to Sabbath; months, to the Passover, etc.; seasons (times), to festive seasons; and some take years of the Sabbatical year which fell 54-55 A.D., and certainly it would be piquant if Paul is writing the letter in this very year.

12-20. A Pathetic Appeal. The very thought of that pitiful relapse stirs emotion in Paul and he breaks away from theological argument into personal appeal. "Free yourselves," he urges, "(from bondage) as I have done, for I also was like you (enslaved). I have no personal complaint to make against you: you have never been anything but kind to me. You remember I came to you a sick man, forced your way for health's sake." This was "on the former of two visits," but perhaps we should simply interpret "at first" (cf. intro., p. 1208a.)

Paul had a physical ailment—perhaps disfiguring—which might have tempted them to despise or shun him (literally, "spit out," mg., v. 14)—as the ancients did on meeting a man with disease, to avoid the influence of the evil spirit in the man. This malady is variously interpreted as (1) ophthalmia (cf. v. 15), (2) malaria (intro., p. 1207a), (3) epilepsy, common in men of ecstatic experience and highstrung temperament like Paul, and regarded with peculiar horror in ancient times as suits the case here (but cf. Woods, Was the Apostle Paul Epileptic? and 1 Cor. 127).

They had received Paul as an angel (cf. Acts 14¹²), nay, with greater respect still, as if he were Christ himself. Paul puts Christ in the supreme place, above angels. They had congratulated themselves on their privilege in having Paul. They would have plucked out their very eyes for him—a proverbial phrase, or, literally, to replace his own weak eyes. Now everything is changed—inexplicably. The Galatians seem to look on the apostle as their enemy. Why? Because he could not keep from insisting on the true gospel and challenging the false!

17. The Judaizers had gone about with specious propaganda, protesting the while that they were merely solicitous for the good of the Galatians. Paul answers that pretense. While he is out for the truth only, these Judaizers are not disinterested: they are partisan. "They are making much of you," says Paul, "but it is for no good end: their policy lands you on their doorstep, outside the pale of God's chosen, and that means you have to make much of them to gain admission to the elect. It is a nice thing to be made much of, provided it is for a good end. I don't mind others (like the Judaizers) making much of you—I don't want that to be restricted to when I'm with you—only, I say it must be for a good end." Solicitude is a fine thing when it is for a high object—such as salvation or liberty, not when it is the cloak to gain sectarian advantage. Ecclesiastical schemers have always been strong in unctuous ways.

19. Maternal tenderness bursts forth—My little children—more in John's style. Paul had been their spiritual mother and now he would fain see them "born over again." They are only babes, Christians in the making yet. Christ has to be formed in them, i.e., re-embodyed in each man. Conversion means that Christ reincarnates himself in us (cf. 1^{15,16}).

20. Paul longs for a personal talk. Face to face they would understand one another better. His anxiety, love, hunger for their good, and all his emotions would become clear in the tones of his voice as they could not in a letter.

21-31. Bond Slaves and Free Men. (Cf. also 51.) Paul's subtle mind flashes to another point: he will confute the enthusiasts for the Law from the Law itself, and that too from the case of Abraham, their spiritual father. He had two sons—Ishmael, the slave-woman's child, born in the ordinary course of nature; Isaac, the freewoman's child, born when Sarah was past the normal age, in vindication of God's promise. Following the ingenious exegesis of his time, he sees therein an allegory. These sons adumbrate and correspond to the two covenants, the one given on Mount Sinai responsible for the enslaved legalists, the other issuing in the freedom of the Christian regime. Hagar would appear to be the Arabic name for Mount Sinai. The Hagarenes were an Arabic tribe (Psa. 83⁶) who had shared in a conspiracy against Israel (cf. v. 29), and in Arabic legend Hagar was represented as Abraham's legal wife. The word "hagar" (meaning "stone" or "rock") would aptly describe rocky Mount Sinai, and Paul would know something of the language (cf. 117). Hence there was a specious reason for linking Hagar and Sinai. The Jerusalem of the time, under Roman rule, represented that old lineage of bondage, while the new Jerusalem—the ideal which according to Jewish ideas existed in heaven (cf. Rev. 21² Heb. 12²²)—corresponded to the Christian Church.

29. According to ancient story (Gen. 21⁹), Ishmael had mocked at Isaac, and legend had magnified that probably into persecution. Here was another correspondence—a foreshadowing of the persecution of the Christians by the Jews. And what did Scripture enjoin? The casting out and disinheriting of Hagar and her child, i.e., the Jewish people would lose its place in the Kingdom. They were utterly different in spirit from Christians and could not be copartners. Christians had secured freedom through Christ, and it was theirs now to stand fast in that privilege and not be caught again in a system of slavery.

CHAPTER V

1-6. An Appeal: Stand by Christian Liberty. Paul has established his case. Experience of the spirit within us and the testimony of O.T. revelation behind us combine to make clear that salvation is by faith, by the response of free moral personality to the gracious approach of God. Christ has canceled any claim that the old dispensation had upon us and he has done it to secure freedom for us. That means freedom from Mosaic regulation and from all external authority whatsoever. Man has spiritual autonomy; conscience is free to regulate its own life. Paul had caught the full significance of Jesus' teaching (Mt. 18¹⁸). Men even yet are so inured to external ordering of their spiritual life that they refuse to take the air though the prison doors are open.

Exultant himself in the exhilarating air of freedom, Paul is amazed that his converts should want again to be confined by constricting observances. The Jewish Law from this standpoint is no better than their old pagan rites. Whatever others may teach, he, Paul, has his testimony to give (cf. 2 Cor. 10¹⁴). He challenges them to face the dilemma: Christ or circumcision. Circumcision was not an extra safeguard which could be added without injuring their Christianity; it was the acceptance of a principle radically different; it put a man outside the gracious relationship of faith and outside the sphere in which Christ could help him. To be granted status among the righteous and so be enabled to gain eternal life in the Kingdom is the objective of our Christian hope. This salvation comes through a spiritual attitude, a responsiveness to the working of God's Spirit upon us, and not through the following of outward fleshly observances. So Paul, having established the theory of his gospel, goes on to urge its practice.

7-12. A Pause for Expostulation. On the edge of practical exhortation Paul breaks off to recall how well they had borne themselves in the Christian life before this interruption of the Judaizers: "It was a fine pace you were keeping. But who cut in on you and kept you from following on the right way (literally, obeying the truth)?" The metaphor is that of running a race (cf. 1 Cor. 9²⁴), and some one or some impediment gets in the way as one blocks a road in war. "It is God who is calling you, but that was not his sort of counsel." It was an exhortation from some evil source to which they had listened. The evil was acting like an insidious leaven. Paul quotes a proverb (cf. 1 Cor. 5⁶) significantly. They know to what or to whom he refers: (1) this false teaching about circumcision is poisoning the whole Christian life, or (2) the small Judaistic section are spreading their evil influence through the whole church. "As for myself I have confidence in you. I am Christ's and so are you, and that is my ground for confidence. I'm sure you will not do other than the right thing." They will take Paul's view of what constitutes true religion, the gospel of faith, and have nothing to do with this Judaizing influence. "The man responsible for confusing you will yet have his judgment to bear, no matter who he be." The reference may be to some one agitator who does not need to be named, as they all know him; or, less likely, to Peter or James; or to anyone who in the future may happen to upset them, as the construction suggests.

"And as for myself, if I am really an advocate of circumcision, why am I an object of persecution? Then the stumbling-block of the cross would be done away" (ironical). Paul had been accused of really standing for circumcision though he had pretended otherwise. Perhaps they quoted some of his actions against him (Acts 18¹⁸ 21²⁶) or his having Timothy circumcised (Acts 16³), or even Titus (cf. 2³). These actions looked like acceptance of the Law as binding after all. Paul, then, was a legalist. But if that were true, he would be popular with Jews, not persecuted as he was. The objection to him was that he preached a gospel of the Cross that did away with the Law. If he were a legalist, and not a preacher of the Cross, they would see nothing offensive in him.

"Would that those who are upsetting you would have themselves mutilated!" Paul utters a bitter, scathing word. They talk, talk about this cutting process—circumcision. Why don't they go further and go in for regular self-mutilation like the worshipers of Cybele? (Cybele was a popular deity in Asia Minor.)

13-26. Liberty Implies the Practice of Love and the Moral Life. Paul returns from his digression to state the implications of the Christian liberty to which the Galatians are called. Paul's letters, even the most theological, lead up to practical exhortation. He is no theorist, but knows well the welter of paganism and the stern problem of maintaining a Christian life in that environment. Converts have every temptation to slackness; so he must be always urging and encouraging. The call of Christ is to a life of freedom, but that did not mean, as some might welcome, the abandoning of the moral restraints. Liberty is not to be made an excuse (starting-point) for indulging the lower instincts. Service to legal prescription is gone, but service of another kind begins, loving service of one another. Christians do not strain over the minutiae of the Law but they fulfill it in spirit. The whole idea behind the Law is carried out in one precept—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev. 19¹⁸). Jesus had found the whole essence of Law and prophecy in that command (Mt. 22^{36f.}), and Paul here shows that he knew more of the Master's teaching than his few quotations suggest. An original mind does not repeat the letter but captures the spirit of his teacher as in 1 Cor. 13. The significance of neighbor has also been silently enlarged in Christianity (cf. Lk. 10^{29f.}). Once meaning "fellow Jew," it now takes in mankind.

15. This law of love means that bickering in the Galatian church must cease. Nagging and snapping at one another, like wild beasts, they must take care and not prove one another's complete undoing.

16. There is no doubt a tug-of-war going on in human nature—flesh and spirit straining against one another: it is inherent in the constitution of things that we are not free to do as we wish. But if the spirit is the driving force in our Christian life, we will not be under the dictation of Law. There are two forces that may control human life: (1) the flesh, man's baser nature with all the evil lusts; (2) the spirit, the higher power, not native to man but given by God. Ideally, man gives himself over to the leading of the spirit and is spiritual. But the fleshly element struggles to keep the mastery, as Paul knew in his own experience (cf. Rom. 7).

19-21. These lists, which mirror pagan society, fall into four groups: (1) sexual vices: fornication, moral impurity (in its grossness, sins of the flesh), and wantonness (unrestrained indecency); (2) vices associated with heathen worship: idolatry (which might carry with it immorality practiced in pagan temples) and sorcery (literally, the drugs used for enchantment); (3) sins of faction: enmity (in general), wrangling, jealousy (of another's goods or fortune), passionate outbursts (of bad feeling), self-seeking (or party spirit), disensions, differences (of opinion or sentiment rather than heresies), envying (preferable to the other reading murders); (4) sins of appetite: drunken debauches, carousings (as in honor of Bacchus). Cf. Rom. 12⁹ 13¹³ 1 Cor. 5¹⁰ 6¹⁰ Eph. 4³¹.

22. The Law issues in painful toil and effort, i.e., "works"; but Christian virtues are fruit springing effortless and spontaneous from the inner principle of life. The catalogue corresponds significantly with vv. 19-21. (1) There are no sexual vices, the flesh is crucified; (2) for idolatry there is the enlightened ethical service of a righteous God—love, and for fear of demons is a happy confidence in salvation; (3) for enmity is peace with all men (rather than with God), patience, etc., faithfulness (i.e., fidelity rather than faith, which is the root, not the fruit of Christian life). Those who follow this way of life are in another atmosphere, beyond the artificial jurisdiction of legalism. There is no need to define these Christian graces further: they are a spirit, not a system to be catalogued like the Law.

In an age which valued the ecstatic, Paul here linked the Spirit indissolubly with wholesome ethical conduct and so set Christianity on the way toward right values (cf. 1 Cor. 12, 13).

24, 25. Christ in the flesh overcame and ended the power of the fleshly principle, and so all in mystical union with him died to sin in his death and are finished with the flesh, even with its inner disposition and desires. Yet there is no automatic attainment of goodness: we must strive to make our lives keep in line with the ideal within.

26. The reference is to the Judaizers who wanted to be fussed over (cf. 4¹⁷), or to the two parties, Jewish and Pauline, who each were parading their form of Christianity as superior, with an offensive note of challenge.

CHAPTER VI

1-10. Christian Social Obligation. Brethren strikes the keynote of the last chapter—an affectionate plea for Christian considerateness. News may have reached Paul of some case of harsh judgment, perhaps inspired by the fanatical spirit of these Judaizing Christians, and here he urges that if any man is detected in wrong conduct, or caught unaware by some temptation, the attitude of Christians—as possessors of the Spirit, one of the fruits of which is meekness—is not to cut him off, as one cuts off a broken limb, but to “mend” or “set” the limb (restore it—a medical term). Christian policy is constructive, not destructive. We must recognize that “to err is human, to forgive divine.” If we bear one another’s burdens, we shall find we are fulfilling the real law, higher than that of Moses, the law of Christ. What the Judaizers did was as Jesus protested of the Pharisees, to bind artificial burdens on men’s shoulders—legal restrictions—a yoke unbearable (Lk. 11⁴⁶ Acts 15¹⁰ 15²⁸). The Christian was, rather, to lighten the real burdens of sorrow, sin, hardship, by sympathy and so fulfill the royal law (cf. 5¹⁴ Mt. 8¹⁷).

3. Thinking oneself to be “something” is the tendency of a man who does not rely wholly on faith but on “works.” The whole thing rests on a radical self-deception. To pride himself on a superior righteousness to his neighbor’s and crow over him (as, e.g., circumcisionists might over the uncircumcised) is wrong: a man must put himself over against an absolute standard and test his actions in the light of the ideal. That would yield joy from one’s own real achievement and not false satisfaction out of another’s demerit.

5. Every man has his own pack to carry

(here burden is a different word from v. 2, used of a ship’s cargo, soldier’s kit); i.e., his own responsibility, stewardship of which he must give an account—irrespective of his neighbors. Each Christian life has its own contribution to make and has its own possibility of weakness or failure. Let us see to that and not cast a comparative glance at others (cf. Mt. 7^{1f.}).

6. The word here used, taught, teacheth, is specially applied to oral instruction: hence “catechetical,” “catechumens.” (1) Probably the reference is to paid teachers who gave full time and required a share in all good things, i.e., including material support (so Burton; cf. 1 Thess. 5¹² 1 Cor. 12²⁸ Eph. 4¹¹ 1 Tim. 5¹⁷). This is to assume that conditions of the second century existed in Paul’s time. Some kind of instruction in doctrine and ethic must have been given, and Paul approved the principle of support for teachers though he himself preferred to earn his living (cf. 1 Cor. 9¹¹). (2) The reference may be a delicate hint that the Galatians might have maintained closer spiritual relations with Paul, their teacher, instead of flying off after false teachers and neglecting to share this wonderful new teaching with him.

7, 8. It is weak to take this as a detached moral precept. It must be knit up with v. 6. Liberality toward spiritual teachers is sowing to the Spirit and would bring the spiritual man’s reward—life on the higher level of the Kingdom. What is spent on spiritual teachers should come back to us in spiritual momentum. Those who, rather, spent their substance on carnal satisfaction were ministering to what was destined to decay and death. The materialistic sensualist need not look for resurrection. In 2 Cor. 9⁶⁻¹⁰ this same simile is applied in reference to the collection for the saints. Others take sowing to the flesh of circumcision and legalism. Eternal life refers to moral quality of life, not temporal extension (cf. Rom. 27 52¹ 62²), the blessedness enjoyed by spiritual beings who realize sonship with the Divine. Mock means literally “turn up the nose at”—probably a proverb.

9, 10. Some may have grown faint-hearted and lapsed as the Lord’s coming was delayed. Paul was still sure of it. But to him it was no reason for slacking: time is a limited season in which we can seize our chances (cf. Lk. 16¹). The reference to the household of faith seems to support the financial view of v. 6. Believers are a family (cf. Mk. 33³⁻³⁵), hence the communistic movement, the collection for the poor saints, etc.

11-18. Conclusion: the Complete Sufficiency of the Crucified Christ. Paul regularly dictated to an amanuensis (cf. Rom. 16²² 2 Thess. 3¹⁷

1 Cor. 16²¹ Col. 4¹⁸). At this point he takes the stylus himself and adds a few words in bold characters, equivalent to underlining, intended for emphasis and to certify the genuineness of the letter. These words read aloud would add a touch of personal appeal and draw attention to the essential lesson which Paul wanted to teach.

12-16. Paul's personal word is very blunt: he imputes a motive to the Judaizers. They want to show up well before their fellow Jews by inculcating a Christianity that keeps up the old Jewish Law and so avoid persecution. In the very earliest days the Christians did not offend Judaism: they merely added to the praxis of good Jews the dogma that Jesus was Messiah. Paul discarded the Law and also linked the sacred Messianic office to the hated cross of a criminal (1 Cor. 12³): he placarded the cross. The Judaizers suppressed the cross and made a show of zeal for the Law and, as nine-tenths-orthodox Jews, were unharmed. They gloried in the fact that the Christians were being circumcised—a worldly success for their policy. Paul had no pride in such worldly success: his glory is in an eternal truth—salvation through the cross. On the cross the fleshly principle was overcome for all time, and so Paul's old self was crucified there too. The present world meant nothing to him after that: it had no appeal. Externals like circumcision do not matter: one thing matters—the new inner life of the Spirit that transforms the whole being (cf. John 3³). On those who conduct their life on that principle the apostle feels he can pray for blessing—the peace of God (in a world of factious strife though they be) and mercy (in the end at the Judgment). These followers of the spiritual life are, in spite of the Judaizers and the Mosaic Law, the real Israel, the faithful remnant who, according to Isaiah, were to be counted worthy to inherit the promised kingdom of God. Christianity proudly claimed the spiritual ancestry of Israel and thus linked itself with all the pious strivings of the best in the past. This was in line with Jesus' claim that he came to fulfill the law.

17. The Judaizers have troubled Paul much: for the future he wants no more mischief-making, no more cause for having to defend his right to apostolic authority: his authority is printed on his body: he has brands that stamp him as Christ's. Persecution had left marks on him (cf. 2 Cor. 4¹⁰ 11²³ Phil. 3¹⁰ Col. 1²⁴). There may be a special reference: (1) he had received wounds in south Galatia (Acts 14¹⁹); (2) he was a slave of Christ, and slaves were branded with the owner's mark; (3) Herodotus speaks of a slave who took refuge in a temple and there received on his body the marks of the god, after which he could not be touched; (4) Paul may have in mind the custom of carrying amulets. A papyrus (third century) has a charm in very similar language, but there it is a miniature coffin of Osiris that is carried. Paul was proud to fill up the sufferings of Christ (Col. 1²⁴). The marks he bore authenticated him and raised him beyond the slanders of such people as the Judaizers. He does not resent trouble. But what was the use of attacking a man with such a hallmark?

18. The strong Epistle ends in tenderness—Brethren. He prays that the gracious kindness that marked Jesus in the flesh, and is his characteristic gift always, may be theirs. That gift comes to the spirit that Paul has just vindicated over against the flesh.

EPHESIANS

BY PROFESSOR C. H. DODD

INTRODUCTION

The Two Halves of the Epistle: Theological and Ethical. The Epistle falls naturally into two halves, the one mainly theological, speculative and mystical, the other mainly practical and ethical. Its structure may be compared with that of Romans. Just as the theological section of Romans culminates in the apostrophe of 11³³ and the doxology of 11³⁶, and the ethical section opens with the "I beseech you therefore, brethren" of 12¹, so the theological section of Ephesians ends with the prayer of 3¹⁴⁻¹⁹ and the doxology of 3^{20, 21}, and the ethical section opens with the "I beseech you therefore" of 4¹. In no other Epistle is the transition so clearly marked as in these two, though Galatians and Colossians also display the same broad division into two parts. The theological section of Ephesians, however, differs profoundly from that of Romans. The latter is closely argued, with a logical process from point to point, complicated, indeed, in Paul's manner by subtle cross-references, digressions and resumptions, but nevertheless constituting a continuous reasoned proof of a thesis. The tone of Eph. 1-3, on the other hand, may perhaps best be described as liturgical. It opens with a long passage in which a statement of God's reconciling purpose in Christ is put in the form of a sustained thanksgiving (1³⁻¹⁴). Next follows a prayer which passes insensibly into a stately recitation of the dignities of Christ, the Head of the church (1¹⁵⁻²³). Next, in the same elevated tone, we have in ch. 2 a description of the work of Christ in the experience of the readers, passing into a proclamation of the unity and universality of the church—all this, not as a reasoned statement meant to convince, but as a prophetic declaration of incontrovertible, patent facts, in a new and lofty setting of eternal principles. Ch. 3 sets out once more to be a prayer, but pauses long upon a note of awed wonder at the part assigned to the apostle himself in a scheme involving all the universe and both eternities, before it reaches at last the intercession, in which the whole thought of the first part is lifted into the region of prayer, and the doxology, in which it is finally absorbed in praise. The whole section is a sustained piece of slow-moving, stately eloquence, never rising into the passionate poetry of Rom. 8²³⁻³⁹ or 1 Cor. 13, but never falling below the dignity of rhythmical liturgical prose.

The style of the second part of Ephesians is more varied. It starts (4¹) with an exhortation to keep the unity of the church, powerfully enforced by a fresh recitation of the divine basis and destiny of that unity. Then follows a series of paragraphs exemplifying in various connections and applications the fundamental moral principles which are embodied in Christ and so are of the essential being of his church, the whole forming perhaps the widest and fullest practical survey of the field of social relations to be found in any one continuous passage of the N.T. The section culminates in a picture of the Christian warrior arrayed in the armor of God for the conflict with evil (6¹⁰⁻²⁰). All that remains is a very brief epistolary conclusion without news or greetings.

Theme of the Epistle. The general theme of the Epistle may be said to be the glory of the church, as the society which embodies in history the eternal purpose of God revealed in Christ. This purpose is the ultimate unity of all being in him. While in the universe at large there are still unreconciled powers affronting the sovereignty of God, the ultimate issue is certain. God has determined to "sum up all things in Christ" (1¹⁰). That might be pure speculation, but for the fact that history and experience witness to the reconciling power of Christ in the creation of that supernatural society in which warring sections of the human race are perfectly reconciled into a whole of harmoniously functioning parts—the church. That Jews and Gentiles should have found their place in the unity of the church seems to the writer the most signal manifestation of reconciling grace. And it is worth while recalling that the enmity of Jew and Gentile was one of the fiercest in the ancient world, and that in the third quarter of the first century it reached its climax in a conflict whose desperate ferocity shocked all beholders. Well might the author, writing about that time, see in the unity of Jewish and Gentile Christians in the one church a mystery and a miracle. He saw that the reconciliation was not accomplished by any kind of compromise between the diverse parties, but by a divine act creating out of both one new humanity. This new humanity is mediated by Christ. He sums up in himself the whole meaning of God, and communicates himself to men, so that humanity may come to realize and express that meaning. The church is "in Christ"; it is his Body, and its members have "put on" the new humanity which is Christ in them (211-22). Thus the corporate life of the church is a perpetual manifestation of Christ as the Fulfiller of the purpose of God. Its ethical practice, down to details, is a working out of that purpose on the level of human experience. The divine purpose which is thus being accomplished is a cosmic purpose. In the great universe, too, there is movement toward unity and completeness: Christ's work will not be done till the whole universe is one in him, to the glory of God. The living and growing unity of the church is, so to speak, a sacrament of the ultimate unity of all things.

Relation to Colossians and Philemon, and the Question of Authorship. The three Epistles, Ephesians, Colossians and Philemon, form a closely related group over against the other Pauline Epistles. Philemon and Colossians are linked by greetings from the same group of friends, and by the allusions to Archippus and Onesimus. Ephesians and Colossians are linked by the reference to Tychicus as the messenger by whom personal news omitted from the letters is to be communicated to the recipients. But beyond this formal link these two Epistles have very close connections of thought and language, which extend to whole sections similarly arranged in both. As Philemon does not deal with any of the doctrinal topics with which the other two are concerned, we cannot expect to find any of these contacts of thought; nevertheless there are subtle echoes of the language both of Colossians and of Ephesians. Further, the situation of the writer as a prisoner seems to be the same in all three. It is clear that we are dealing with an interrelated group of writings, and the critical questions they raise can best be discussed as one problem.

Denial of Pauline Authorship. The authenticity of all three as the work of Paul has been doubted, on grounds of divergences in thought and language from the undoubted Pauline Epistles. These divergences must be at once admitted, at least as regards Ephesians and Colossians, and in the case of each it is easy to make out a plausible motive for the production of the writing under the name of Paul. The teaching they put forth is new and important, and Paul's authority might well be used to commend it.

The case of Philemon is different. If it is not a genuine letter of Paul, then someone has been to extraordinary pains to produce complete verisimilitude. What is there in the letter which would make it worth anyone's while to take such pains? It puts forth no doctrine, touches no controversy, serves no ecclesiastical interest. It has, indeed, been suggested that it was intended as a polemical tract on slavery. The suggestion shows a complete misunderstanding of the letter. It may fairly be said that this is one of the cases where, at the risk of seeming to be "subjective," one has the right to say that the writing carries its authentication on its face. Nowadays, in fact, to reject it is a mere eccentricity of criticism. But its acceptance has a bearing on the more difficult question of the authenticity of Colossians and Ephesians. For Philemon shares, though in a lesser degree, in their peculiarities, and at least forms a bridge between them and the admitted Pauline Epistles.

The Argument from Style and Vocabulary. Ephesians and Colossians both show certain peculiarities of language as compared with other Pauline writings. Nor are these such as can be readily accounted for by lapse of time. The linguistic question cannot profitably be discussed in detail in a commentary not addressed to readers of Greek. Even the English reader, however, must be aware of a certain difference of style in reading, say, 1 Corinthians and Ephesians. An attempt has been made to reduce the vague feeling of style to precise terms by a measurement of Pauline rhythms (see H. J. Rose, Journal of Theol. Studies, Oct., 1923).

Then there is the difference of vocabulary. Both Colossians and Ephesians contain many terms not elsewhere used by Paul. Here again a statistical computation has been made (P. N. Harrison, in The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles). From a count of the new words appearing in Epistles undoubtedly written by Paul, and a comparison with the number of new words appearing in Colossians and Ephesians, Harrison finds that the proportion is about the same in each case. What is true is that the fresh vocabulary of these Epistles, especially of Ephesians, tends to be of a certain marked type. This, however, may perhaps be accounted for by the subject matter and the new lines of thought.

The Argument from Content: Colossians. To the subject matter and the new lines of thought we must now turn; for, indeed, the purely linguistic and stylistic arguments are not conclusive. That the Christology of Colossians is in some respects different from that put forth in any of the admitted Pauline Epistles is certainly true. For those who cannot think that Paul is likely to have made any serious new departure in his theological thinking during the comparatively short period covered by his Epistles—a period, too, falling fairly late in his life—this will seem a very weighty count against Pauline authorship. Yet Paul's thought can be proved to have developed within his earlier epistolary period, and countless instances could be cited of men, certainly no more free or versatile in their thinking than Paul, who made much more profound changes in their philosophy at an even more advanced age.

But it has been supposed that the type of thought attacked in this Epistle belongs to a later age than Paul's lifetime. This, which to a former generation of scholars seemed a formidable objection, has lost its force through the more adequate study of the early history of Gnosticism (cf. art., Backgrounds, pp. 849f.), which has shown it to be in its main outlines actually pre-Christian. There is, in fact, no difficulty in supposing that the type of "heresy" attacked in Colossians may have confronted Paul in the later stages of his ministry. The question is whether he is likely to have replied to it in just this way. The commentary will show that there is nothing in the Christology of Colossians which could not have developed, along lines of argument strictly analogous to those employed by Paul in undoubted Epistles, from positions assumed by him at an early stage.

More striking than the new Christology is the new attitude to existing social institutions as compared with 1 Corinthians. If Paul wrote Colossians, certainly he had greatly changed his mind since writing to Corinth. But was Paul incapable of learning from experience? As a matter of fact, already in the ethical teaching of Romans there is some foreshadowing of the change from eschatological fanaticism to the positive valuation of the social order in Colossians. If it be urged again that certain characteristic doctrines of "Paulinism," such as original sin, imputed righteousness, or justification by faith, are absent or unimportant in Colossians, the answer is that we do wrong to define "Paulinism" narrowly on the basis of Romans and Galatians alone, and that the central ideas of Paul's gospel (apart from the over-emphasis of certain aspects called forth by controversy) are as clearly and forcibly expressed here as in any other Epistle. The supposed objections to Pauline authorship from the character of the thought do not, on examination, prove to be insuperable, or, indeed, if it be once conceded that Paul did continue to develop in thought after writing Romans, very cogent. We may therefore permit ourselves to be influenced by the strong impression which the letter makes of having been written at the same time as Philemon, by the same person, and in the same general situation.

The Argument from Content: Ephesians. The case of Ephesians is more difficult. On the one hand the recognition of Colossians as genuine might seem to help to establish Ephesians, which shares with it so many peculiarities. But since this Epistle, if genuine, must have been written practically simultaneously with Colossians, every smallest difference in style and thought is more difficult to account for than if the two could be regarded as separated by an interval. And the differences are actually by no means small. Even where the characteristic vocabulary of the two Epistles is the same, it is sometimes used with varying shades of meaning, surprising in letters written at one time. Again, though many of the ideas of Colossians, notably its "cosmic" Christology, reappear in Ephesians, yet the general emphasis and direction of the thought are often appreciably different. Then there is a difficulty in the reference to "apostles" (of whom Paul counted himself one) as the "foundation of the church," as though the writer were living in a period when the apostles were no longer living. There is also, apart from the reference to Tychicus, no evidence that the writer had personal knowledge of his correspondents or any interest in their particular concerns, whereas Paul had the deepest interest in Ephesus. It is therefore often held that the Epistle is the work of a disciple of Paul, writing after his death, and using Colossians as the basis of a new work in which he sought to set forth some fresh developments of Paulinism, true, as he believed, to the general spirit of his master, though never explicitly thought out by him.

This is a hypothesis which cannot be lightly dismissed in face of the undeniable difficulties of the theory of Pauline authorship. It is, however, itself not without difficulties. When Ephesians is compared closely with Colossians, it is by no means clear that Colossians is always prior to Ephesians. There are places where it would seem that if one is borrowing from the other the borrower is Colossians and not Ephesians.

The greatest difficulty, however, of the negative view is a psychological one. Suppose that the real author of Ephesians is someone other than Paul. Then he is at once a powerful and original thinker, and one who has entered into the very heart of Paul's own thought in such a way as to bring the whole course of his theological development to its predestined climax. For whether the Epistle is by Paul or not, certainly its thought is the crown of Paulinism. This supposed author, then, must have been a man of exceptional intellectual vigor. Yet he must be held to have modeled his great work slavishly on Colossians, certainly a less powerful composition, to the extent of imitating its arrangement and borrowing its phrases. Does one find such faithful dependence and such daring originality in one and the same person? Or is it more likely that the freedom and power of Ephesians, combined with such close similarity to Colossians, is the result of a more sustained and concentrated intellectual effort on the part of the same mind which had just produced the lesser work?

If this argument be felt to carry any weight, then the reader will be disposed to allow full force to the attempt made in the commentary to show that at several points the thought of the Epistle, rightly understood, has a deeper unity both with the specific thought of Colossians and with Pauline thought as a whole than sometimes at first appears; and that even those passages which seem least reconcilable with Pauline authorship are perhaps capable of being understood in a way consistent with it.

The difficulty of the un-Pauline style still remains. Yet there are passages which by their very roughnesses and imperfections recall the characteristic style of earlier Epistles. It is not easy to imagine such being produced by an imitator. If, however, Paul is the author, then we can say with something approaching certainty that Ephesus was not the destination. The objections to such an Epistle being sent to the Ephesians from the hand of Paul are, indeed, insuperable. But the name of Ephesus is not very securely attested in the address (see notes on 11), and it remains possible that the writing was something like an encyclical—a document intended to be read by a larger circle of Christian communities, some known, others unknown to the apostle. There are, indeed, difficulties in this hypothesis, but there are difficulties about any solution yet proposed to this perplexing problem.

Literature: Hort, Prolegomena to Romans and Ephesians; Westcott, The Epistle to the Ephesians; Dale, Lectures on Ephesians; Armistage Robinson, St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians; Abbott, Ephesians and Colossians (International Critical Commentary); Barry, St. Paul and Social Psychology: An Introduction to the Epistle to the Ephesians.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Epistolary Address. The form of address is one of the various modifications of current convention found in the Pauline Epistles, and is closely similar to that in Colossians.

The words at Ephesus are absent in some of the best MSS. Similarly in Rom. 17 there is authority—though less strong authority—for the omission of the words “in Rome.” The absence of the words might be accounted for in two ways: either (a) a letter originally addressed to a single church may have been later adapted to general reading by the omission of the name, or (b) a letter originally written either for general publication or to be sent to many churches may have been addressed in one particular copy—the ancestor of most of our MSS.—to the particular church mentioned. The former is generally thought to be the explanation in the case of Romans. In the case of Ephesians, the question is complicated by the fact that Marcion in the second century knew this Epistle as The Epistle to the Laodiceans. It is possible, therefore, that both Ephesus and Laodicea may have possessed copies of the original letter, each naturally addressed to the particular church by name. Without the words in Ephesus the address might be rendered to the saints who are also believers in Christ Jesus.

3-14. Ascription of Praise to God for His Redeeming Purpose. Paraphrase: “Blessed be God who has given us all blessings of the heavenly life in Christ! From eternity he chose us for his own, and predestined us to be his sons through Christ, and this has come to pass by his grace toward us in the Beloved—to his praise and glory. For in Christ we have freedom, forgiveness, and (by his grace) knowledge of his secret purpose to bring the whole universe into unity in Christ—the same in whom we, who cherish this great hope, have been made God’s own people, with a destiny before us that will redound to his praise and glory. In him you, my friends, who heard and believed the gospel, have received, in receiving the Divine Spirit, a present guarantee of the final consummation when the people of God will be wholly free—to his praise and glory.”

It was a convention of the period to commence even ordinary letters with thanksgiving and prayer. Paul adopted this convention and used it to set what he had to say from the very outset in its true religious context. Usually he employed the ordinary phrase, “I thank God,” in various settings; in 2 Corinthians he used the more Hebraic formula, “Blessed be God.” This is the form here (which is not, therefore, either un-Pauline or unsuitable to a genuine letter). The ascription of praise is virtually complete in v. 3; but the thought of the blessings enjoyed in Christ branches out in various directions, and leads to the long chain of clauses, which formally are but one sentence, down to v. 14. It is a kind of hymn of the grace of God, in rhythmic prose. The sound and rhythm are the best guide to the articulation of the thought. We may take the recurrent phrase, to the praise of his glory, as a refrain rounding off the several strophes, which are introduced by the words in whom. We then have, first, an outburst of praise to God for all he has done in Christ, and then a meditation on those last two words, in three stages.

3. Spiritual blessing means more than blessing belonging to the non-material sphere; it is explained by v. 13. Blessings mediated by the Divine Spirit are enjoyed by Christians in the heavenly places. Christ, having left this mortal sphere, is alive on a higher plane of existence (120)—the plane on which discarnate intelligences live, evil as well as good (121 310 612). But insofar as we are "risen with Christ" we too are denizens of this immortal sphere (26; cf. Col. 112 31-4 and notes there). The most real life of the Christian is not that ostensible existence which is still involved with material conditions, but the life in which he communes with eternal realities, which is the same life essentially that he will live beyond the grave.

In Christ (a phrase which governs the whole of this passage, and, indeed, in some sort the whole Epistle) is an expression apparently coined by Paul on the model of the common expression "in the Spirit." The underlying metaphor is derived from space-relations: Christ is thought of as the encompassing atmosphere (as it were) of the true life of the Christian community (which according to another metaphor is his "body"). It stands for the idea that Christians are in such inconceivably intimate spiritual relations with their Lord (cf. 1 Cor. 617) that he may be regarded as in some sort an "inclusive personality," embracing the whole of the real life of his church, each member of which can therefore ideally use the words, "I live, and yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal. 220). The content of this idea is greatly enriched and illuminated from various points of view by the argument of this Epistle (see intro.).

4. With this verse is introduced the thought (which runs through the passage) of the divine choice, expressed elsewhere as predestination, good pleasure, will (v. 5), counsel, or purpose (v. 11), conceived as prior to history and human experience. Philosophically the idea raises difficult problems of free-will and determinism. But here (and in the N.T. in general) it is not, primarily at least, a philosophical conception but a religious one. The more deep and powerful religious experience is, the more strongly is it colored by a sense of awe before that in God which utterly transcends our intelligence (cf. Rom. 1133). For Paul (and for the author of this Epistle, whether Paul or not) the deepest and most powerful religious experience is that of the grace of God, with all its riches of "spiritual blessing." It is all felt as utterly miraculous and mysterious, and at the same time as so urgently real that it is referred at every point to the direct working of God himself (see Col. 112, note). The sense of awe with which this experience is consequently suffused expresses itself in such language as this. As a contribution to theology it may be regarded as establishing the fact that in religious experience we are in touch with a free originating act of the mighty will of God, unconditioned by anything in the world or out of it. Where this fact is firmly held in view, religious thought is safeguarded alike from a mechanical determinism and from a mechanical legalism.

Holy and without blemish. The holiness and blamelessness spoken of in v. 4 are primarily (as in Col. 122, note) the marks of our present religious standing before God, not of our ultimate moral attainment; though this is not excluded from view in so wide-ranging an utterance as this. There is some doubt whether in love should be connected with what precedes (as generally in this Epistle); if it should, then it would most probably stand for the inclusive moral quality of the life which in a religious sense is holy and blameless. If it should be connected with what follows, it means the love of God as the foundation of his purpose for us. Either would give a good sense; the former is favored by the rhythm.

7. Cf. Col. 113, note.

8, 9. Insight into the will of God is part of "salvation" (cf. Col. 19, 10, 27; and notes). Such insight involves the recognition of something which is not knowable in the ordinary ways of knowledge, but revealed as a mystery to faith, namely, the ultimate goal of the divine purpose. When the process of history is completed—the fullness of the times—all diverse and often conflicting elements in the universe will be brought into unity in Christ. To sum up means, in logic, to bring a multiplicity of concepts under one inclusive idea (Rom. 139); in mathematics, to express in one quantity the value of many separate quantities. A cognate word is used of a corporation so completely organized that a single individual can fully represent the whole body and all its members (so in Xenophon, Cyropaedia, viii, 1:15). In 1 Cor. 1524-28 all powers in the universe are subjected to Christ, who then surrenders the sovereignty to God. In Col. 1²⁰ (see note) Christ reconciles all warring powers among themselves and to God. The thought here is similar (and therefore thoroughly Pauline).

11. The church is "the Israel of God" (Gal. 6¹⁶); and therefore God's heritage or lot, like ancient Israel (Deut. 9²⁹ 32⁹; cf. Rom. 9²⁵). The sense is illustrated by comparison with 21-22 36.

12. At this point it becomes important to determine what is meant by the we of this verse, as distinguished from the "ye" of the next. The same question arises at other points in the Epistle. Some hold that here and throughout we means Jews (Jewish Christians), and "ye" Gentiles. On this view the closing words of the present verse would refer specifically to Jewish believers, to whom the gospel first came (cf. Rom. 1¹⁶). The general sense would then be, "In the inscrutable providence of God it came about that we Jews were the first to hope in Christ, but you Gentiles (v. 13) none the less have been made a part of his people." The thought of the union of Jews and Gentiles in one church is one of the principal themes of the Epistle. Nevertheless, the distinction does not seem in place here, in a passage where we has consistently stood for the whole Christian community, and no indication is given that it changes its meaning at this point. Take the last words of v. 12, then, as meaning, not "hoped before others," but "hoped before the event" (cf. Rom. 8²⁴, 25). Some day the unification of the universe in Christ will be manifest to all, but we, who have cherished this hope before the issue became plain, will be God's greatest glory. V. 13 then applies to the readers in particular ("you") what has been said of the church in general (cf. Col. 1²¹).

13, 14. The possession of the Spirit of God is appealed to as a matter of experience, a fact from which inferences can be drawn (cf. Gal. 3²¹). This experience of life in the Spirit is the earnest or "first installment" of full salvation (cf. 2 Cor. 1²² Rom. 8²³). Though the church has already been "redeemed" or "emancipated" (v. 7), yet in another sense this "emancipation" is future (cf. Rom. 7²⁴ 8²³), and the present experience of the Spirit is "a first installment of our inheritance, pending the full emancipation of God's people." This conception of salvation as a state of blessedness which cannot be fully realized within the present order of things, and yet can be authentically enjoyed here and now in religious experiences, runs through the whole N.T., and may be traced back to the teaching of Jesus Christ about a "kingdom of God" for whose coming we are to pray, and which has already come (Mt. 12²⁸).

15-23. Intercession for the Readers of the Epistle, Passing into Contemplation of the Glory of Christ in His Church. Paraphrase: "That is why I thank God for your faith, and pray constantly that you may have a clearer vision and a fuller apprehension of the infinite grandeur of all that is destined for you, and of the divine power that lies behind it—the power that raised Christ from death to the place of universal sovereignty. This sovereign Christ is the Head of the holy Community, which embodies in itself the totality of what he is."

The beginning of this section corresponds pretty closely with the normal epistolary opening of thanksgiving and prayer as we find it in most Pauline Epistles (and notably in Colossians); but the theme of thanksgiving having already expanded to great length in the preceding section, the writer passes quickly to prayer. Both thanksgiving and prayer are similar in content to those found in Col. 13-5, 9 (notes). The prayer, beginning in v. 17, passes insensibly at v. 20 into a statement of the dignity and work of Christ. There is no break grammatically at this point, but there is a break in the sense, and the prayer is not fully resumed until 31⁴.

18. Hope, here as in Col. 1⁵, is the thing hoped for, not the hopeful state of mind. It depends on God's calling, which is correlative to his "choice" (1⁴) and "good pleasure" (1⁵; see Rom. 8²⁹, 30 Gal. 1¹⁵, 16a.). The thing hoped for is otherwise described as the inheritance (so best here, not of the church as God's "heritage"). It is the state of full salvation with all that it involves. This spiritual estate (to carry on the metaphor) is God's (hence his inheritance) before it is "ours" (1¹⁴), and it is he who has delivered to us the "first installment," which makes it quite sure that ultimately the whole will be ours. We "inherit" not individually but as members of a "holy" community (the form of expression rests upon such passages as Num. 32¹⁰ Judg. 11²; cf. Acts 20³² 26¹⁸).

19, 20. The thought passes from the knowledge of God to the experience of his power as in Col. 1⁹⁻¹¹; and this is associated with the resurrection of Christ, as in Col. 2¹². For a writer who (like Paul and most Jewish thinkers; see p. 845b) did not hold the Platonic (and modern) conception of the natural immortality of man, all life from the dead is miracle, i.e., direct manifestation of divine power (and every true conversion is life from the dead; see below, 25). Thus the resurrection of Christ after death is a standing proof of the reality and greatness of divine power, to which nothing is impossible.

21, 22. Christ is not merely alive from the dead, but is raised to the supreme place in the universe (cf. Phil. 29-31 Col. 116-18 210 33; and see notes on Col. 116-18 for the theology underlying this). The traditional names of the superhuman orders of being are used here, as frequently by Paul, with a certain carelessness, as of contempt, and the list is left incomplete with a kind of "et cetera." The word name is used because these titles of mythical beings were taken with great solemnity and used as "names to conjure with" in the literal sense. The pronunciation of the appropriate names was held to call forth immeasurable powers, and such invocation was very frequent in magical practices (cf. Acts 19¹⁹ for such practices at Ephesus). Paul says, in effect, "name all the names of power you know, and still there is a Power supreme over them." For the two worlds or ages, cf. Col. 113, note.

22. The transition from Christ's sovereignty in the universe (which is a matter of faith) to his sovereignty in the church (which is a matter of experience) is made exactly as in Col. 117. The full significance of this connection of ideas comes out more fully later in this Epistle (especially 39-41). The church is here, as in Colossians, the body of which Christ is the head; a figure closely similar to that found in earlier Pauline Epistles, where the church is "the body of Christ," or "one body in Christ" (1 Cor. 12¹², 27 Rom. 124, 5). In both cases the underlying idea is the same, namely, that the unity of the church is grounded in an inconceivably intimate connection with Christ, as well as a complete subordination to him.

23. The church is the fullness (pleroma) of Christ. The precise meaning of this statement is not clear. The technical sense of pleroma is explained in Col. 119, note. We may not, however, assume that this precise technical meaning is in place here. Yet the root meaning, "full content," "totality," which underlies the technical use, must be maintained here and throughout the Epistle. Thus in 110 "the fullness of the times" means the time-process as complete. In 319 we have the expression "the pleroma of God," closely similar to "the pleroma of deity" (i.e., the totality of the divine attributes) in Col. 29. Now, according to Colossians the pleroma of deity resides in Christ. Thus in Eph. 413 we read of "the pleroma of Christ," which we may take to mean the full content of the divine nature and character as embodied in Christ. This, further, is something to which the church, according to 413, is to attain. It is therefore the less surprising to learn in the present passage that the church is itself ideally the pleroma of Christ, in the sense that it embodies in its own life and experience the whole meaning, value, and power of the life of its Head. Accordingly, we can understand the prayer of 319 that the church may be completed until it becomes a pleroma of God, i.e., until its perfected life expresses the whole of the life of God as revealed in Christ. The thought is difficult, but not unintelligible in the light of Paul's deep mysticism. Its governing assumption may be put in the form that Christ is to the church as God is to Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 113).

We now turn to the second part of the verse. Here it is doubtful whether the verb to fill is to be understood as active or passive. In 319 it is the church which is filled, or completed, and in 410 it is Christ who fills. We should therefore expect here the sense given by the R.V. who filleth all in all; and this, indeed, may be the sense (except that the implied meaning would be more accurately—"who is gradually filling"). But if so, the grammatical form of the verb is very exceptional. It should naturally mean "Christ who is being filled, or completed." If Christ is thought of as an "inclusive personality," in whom the church lives and grows (221) and in whom the whole universe is ultimately to be "summed up," then there is a sense in which he is not complete until this process is finished. Thus it would be possible to understand the whole verse as meaning "the church, as being his body, expresses the totality of Him who is everywhere and in all respects growing complete."

CHAPTER II

1-10. New Life in Christ: The Witness of Experience to the Grace of God. Paraphrase: "Of that holy community you are members. Once you were no better than dead—so deeply were you implicated in the wickedness of an evil world-order, whose governing principle is active to-day in pagan society. We were all implicated in it, for we were at the mercy of our evil impulses and ideas, destined to a terrible retribution. But God was so infinitely loving and pitiful that even when we were dead in our wickedness he raised us from death to a heavenly life with Christ. This establishes for all succeeding ages the wonderful wealth of his graciousness in Jesus Christ. For it is by his grace that you have been delivered, through trusting him; and even that trust itself was his gift and no merit of yours. We are his handiwork, created by him in Jesus Christ to do good according to his purpose from of old."

The passage of thought from the universal dignity of Christ, through a reference to his lordship in the church, to a direct appeal to experience in verification, is parallel to the movement of thought in Colossians from 1¹⁵⁻²⁰ to 1²¹⁻²³ (cf. also Col. 2¹³⁻¹⁵; and notes on both these passages). There is no real break in sense or grammar at Eph. 1¹³. The theme—continued in the present passage—is still the power of God as witnessed by the resurrection of Christ, and now by our resurrection with him. Parenthetically the writer dwells on the condition out of which Christ raised us (2^{2, 3}). He then returns and completes what he started to say. This line of thought reaches its natural conclusion in v. 6. But in developing it the writer has been led, through contemplating the terrible and hopeless condition in which man lies apart from God, to feel acutely that nothing but sheer grace could meet such a situation. So the thought passes from the power of God to his love, pity, grace, kindness. It is these qualities which form the subject of vv. 7-10. Yet they are, after all, another manifestation of the power; for they too are creative (v. 10).

2. Non-Christians are living still in this world (or age), while Christians live in "the age to come" (see Col. 1¹³, notes). This age is thought of as under the domination of spiritual powers hostile to man's true life (cf. 1 Cor. 2¹² 2 Cor. 4⁴ Gal. 1⁴).

3. That which in experience bears witness to that domination is the inward power of evil instincts (the desires of the flesh) and false ideas (the desires of the mind). The writer associates himself with his readers as having known what it was to be under this dominance of evil (if he is Paul we may aptly compare Rom. 7⁷⁻²⁴). In that condition all were children of wrath, i.e., according to a common Hebraic idiom, "within the sphere of wrath." Wrath, as in Paul regularly, is not an emotion of anger in the mind of God, but a process of retribution in history (cf. Rom. 1^{18f.} 1 Thess. 2¹⁶). The meaning is not that an originally corrupt nature made us children of wrath; Paul uses nature either in a neutral sense (e.g., Rom. 2²⁷ 11²¹⁻²⁴ Gal. 2¹⁵ 4⁸) or in a definitely good sense (e.g., Rom. 2¹⁴ 1 Cor. 1¹¹⁴; cf. Rom. 1²⁶, 27, where that which is "against nature" is therefore wrong); the sense is that within a natural order itself good, evil character and conduct necessarily bring disaster. It is just the fact that in a universe of God's making man has nevertheless brought destruction on himself that makes the tragic knot Christ came to unravel.

6. Raised us up, and made us sit simply repeat the verbs used about Christ in 1²⁰. The underlying thought is the intimate "mystical" union of Christ and his people (cf. Col. 2²⁰, note). Here, however, the "death" out of which we rise is not the fellowship of Christ's death to sin (as in Rom. 6²⁻⁴), but the moral and spiritual condition which is the exact opposite of "eternal life" (as in Col. 2¹³, cf. Rom. 7¹⁰, 11). Note that here as in Col. 1¹³ salvation is regarded as an accomplished fact, though in Eph. 1¹⁴ (see note) it is an object of hope.

8, 9. A most precise formulation of the central Pauline idea: we are saved—not by faith, but—by grace, through faith: the efficient cause is God's grace alone, and our faith (not our works—the familiar Pauline antithesis) is the condition of its exercise (cf. Rom. 4², 16). A parenthesis makes it clear that "saving faith" must not be regarded as a meritorious activity of the human will, but as itself God's gift. To press this into a theory leads to great difficulties, but it is vital to religion as Paul conceived it (see notes on 1³⁻¹⁴ Col. 1¹²).

10. Good works. They are a result, not a cause of salvation (Jas. 2, notes).

11-22. The New Unity of Mankind in Christ. Paraphrase: "Remember that there was a time when you, as pagans, were entirely outside the divine society (as represented by the Jewish people), and had no part in the purpose of God. But Christ has by the sacrifice of himself brought the outsiders in. It was the institutions of the Jewish Law that kept us apart and made us enemies one of another. This Law Christ has abolished: he has broken down the barrier and made peace between the hostile sections of the human race. In doing so he has brought into being a new type of humanity. And so we are now one body, animated by one Spirit, and reconciled to God. The consequence is that you, formerly outsiders, are now members of the family and commonwealth of God. That commonwealth is like a great building, which, with the prophets and apostles for its foundations and Christ for its coping-stone, is growing into a temple of God. Into this temple you are being built, and in it God dwells."

In this section we have the first express exposition of what is the specific central idea of this Epistle. The writer has just reminded his readers of their experience of the life-giving grace of God. That experience is the "first installment" (1¹⁴) of God's ultimate purpose; so far he is recapitulating what must have been familiar to all Pauline Christians. He now calls their attention to one special aspect of Christian experience, namely, the experience of unity in a true commonwealth, which for him is the "first installment" of the unity of all being spoken of in 1¹⁰. This is more definitely new teaching, and it is set forth with some elaboration. There are points of close contact with Col. 1²⁰, 21 2¹⁴.

11. Here for the first time the readers are identified, for purposes of argument, with Gentile Christians in general; but note how carefully the writer avoids identifying himself with Jewish Christians over against them ("you that were far . . . them that were nigh" [v. 17; cf. v. 13]; while we [v. 18] stands for the Christian community as a whole). With the attitude to circumcision cf. Col. 2¹¹, note.

12. The commonwealth of Israel is an ideal community, continuous in history (cf. Rom. 9-11, where the whole philosophy of the matter is expounded); temporarily embodied before Christ in the Jewish nation, to which the covenants historically appertained (cf. Rom. 9⁴, 5). Consequently, before Christ non-Jews were alien from the divine commonwealth, and belonged to "the world," under the dominion of the "world-rulers" (6¹²).

13. Here already Isa. 57¹⁹, quoted in v. 17, is present to the writer's mind. The reference to this prophecy determines the course of the argument, which, formally regarded, is a demonstration that Isaiah is speaking of Christ and his reconciling work. Cf. Rom. 10⁵⁻¹⁵, where the argument is similarly based on the continuous exegesis of an O.T. passage. The method is thoroughly Pauline. On the blood of Christ see Col. 1²⁰, note.

14, 15. The enmity and peace spoken of in these verses are primarily between sections of the human race, though, as the hostility of man to man is bound up with alienation from God, so reconciliation among men involves reconciliation to God (vv. 16, 18). It is best to take the enmity in apposition to the middle wall of partition (as the reality of which that is the figure), instead of in apposition to the Law as in R.V. We may render, "He made both one and destroyed the dividing barrier of enmity, by abolishing the Law with its statutes and precepts." The words in his flesh might be connected with either clause, signifying that it was through his human life and death that Christ effected this. It is an important point that the abolition of the Law was necessary if Jews and Gentiles were ever to meet on equal terms in one society; for the Law was essentially a national institution, and it was valued precisely for its effectiveness in maintaining the separateness of the Jewish people. The new unity is not simply a reconciliation of Jew and Gentile as such; it is a creative act (cf. v. 10)—the creation of a new human type, which is neither Jewish nor Gentile, but Christian. In fact the new man is Christ living in his church (cf. 4¹³⁻¹⁶ Col. 3¹¹ Gal. 3²⁸).

16-18. Note the close parallelism of the clauses to reconcile both | in one body | unto God | through the cross: we both have access | in one Spirit | unto the Father | (through him). The one body and the one Spirit are correlative ideas (cf. 4⁴ 1 Cor. 12¹³). The body is that mystical body of Christ, the organ of his personality, which had a temporary manifestation in his body of flesh destroyed on the cross, but a more permanent manifestation in the church, which is constituted his body because his indwelling Spirit creates its common life.

19. Gentile Christians are thus no longer foreign to the divine commonwealth; nor are they mere "resident aliens" in it. (The term translated sojourners was used to denote residents in a Greek city without full civic rights, and the corresponding term in the O.T. to denote Gentiles resident in Israelite territory.) This was, in fact, the status to which the old Judaizing party, Paul's lifelong adversaries, had wished to confine Gentiles in the church. They are full members of the holy community. Thus is signalized the success of Paul's long championship of Gentile rights.

20, 21a. The figure of the body is suddenly changed (the change being mediated by the reference in v. 19 to the "household" of God) into the figure of a building (cf. 1 Cor. 3¹⁰⁻¹⁷). O.T. passages lie behind this figure, especially Isa. 28¹⁶ Psa. 118²². (Cf. also 1 Pet. 2^{4f}. Mk. 12¹⁰, 11, with expanded parallels in Matthew and Luke.) The foundation of the building here (unlike 1 Cor. 3¹¹) consists of the apostles and the (Christian) prophets (cf. 3⁵ Mt. 16¹⁸); and Christ is the chief corner stone, i.e., probably the stone forming the angle of a pediment or gable, and so completing the whole building. Thus the "chief corner stone" is to the building what the head is to the body, and the two figures are kept parallel. Yet it is impossible to make the analogy adequate to describe the relation of Christ to his church, for it is "in him" (see note on 1³) that the whole process of its growth or upbuilding takes place. The phrase each several building is required by the strict grammatical rules of classical Greek; but it gives no good sense; for the idea of a great church composed of federated churches is entirely alien, and if Jews and Gentiles were meant, we should have had "both" and not "every." But the looser grammar of Hellenistic Greek allows the

A.V. rendering "the whole building," which is appropriate.

21b, 22. Note again the close parallelism: in whom | the whole building | fitly framed together groweth | into a holy temple | in the Lord: in whom | ye | are builded together | into (mg.) a habitation of God | in the Spirit. What is said of the whole church is applied with precision to the special case of the readers. And observe that in the Lord and in the Spirit are closely related expressions.

CHAPTER III

1-13. The Revelation of the Mystery. Paraphrase: "For this reason I am praying for you here in my prison. You know what God has done for me—how he has given me insight into his deepest truths. I can only refer you to what I have already written for proof of this. In former generations no one suspected the truth which has now been revealed to the apostles and prophets of God, namely, that the non-Jewish peoples stand on the same footing as Jews in the purpose of God—partners in the great inheritance, members of the same body, sharers in our high destiny in Christ. This is the glorious secret that I have been divinely commissioned to proclaim. The very existence of the Christian society is a plain demonstration to all discarnate intelligences in the universe of the many-sided wisdom of God in his age-long purpose embodied in Christ, our sole and sufficient Ground of assurance. Since this is the truth for which I am imprisoned, there is nothing in my imprisonment to cause you either discouragement or shame."

The words for this cause clearly begin the sentence which is completed in v. 14; i.e., the writer is intending to hark back to his interrupted prayer (117-19). The sentence, however, is scarcely begun when a fresh interruption occurs. Paul feels the need to say something about his own standing in relation to the readers and in relation to the remarkable ideas which he is communicating. He is a person intrusted with a special revelation which he dare not keep to himself. He therefore states first briefly and decisively the content of this revelation (vv. 5, 6), and then passes on to speak of the task in consequence laid upon himself (vv. 7-13), with a fresh parenthesis (vv. 10-12) further developing the idea of the revelation of an ancient secret. The section has an intricate parallelism with Col. 123, 29 (notes). For further Pauline parallels cf. Rom. 111-16 1515-19 (with some remarkable echoes of language) and 1625-27.

2, 3. This conviction of having, through the sheer grace of God and through no merit of his own, received a direct revelation is thoroughly characteristic of Paul (cf. 1 Cor. 310 41 Gal. 112, 16 22 2 Cor. 210-14 121f.). This is for him nothing to boast of (2 Cor. 125), for it not only leaves him no scope for the display of intellectual distinction (1 Cor. 23-5), but even leaves him no free choice in the matter of his life-work (1 Cor. 915-18). Hence the combination of this lofty sense of a divine mission and authority with a humility which is not mock-modesty (v. 8). The reference to something he wrote before is to vv. 11-22 (not to a previous letter). If the readers will attentively consider what they have just read they will see that, brief as it is, it contains something that could only have come to a man through divine illumination, and therefore understand why the author takes such an authoritative tone.

5. The revelation comes in (by) the Spirit, and therefore to "spiritual" or inspired men, and especially to apostles and prophets, the first in the various orders of inspired ministries (411 1 Cor. 1228). If, therefore, Paul is the writer, he is claiming no more than we know him to have claimed. Yet in Col. 125, 26 the mystery is revealed to the "saints" or members of the holy community in general.

6-9. A precise definition is given in v. 6 of the content of the "mystery" (v. 4; cf. v. 9). In Col. 127 it is otherwise stated (but see note there). In 1 Cor. 26-10 the "mystery" is (as in v. 10 below) the mode in which the divine "wisdom" exists, and it refers especially to future glory. So in Col. 127 it concerns "the hope of glory," and in Eph. 19, 10 it refers to the ultimate "summing-up" of all things in Christ. In Rom. 1125 one particular aspect of the "mystery" is touched upon, namely, temporary "hardening" of Israel with a view to the ultimate gathering-in of the Gentiles. In Col. 127 the reference to the conversion of the Gentiles is present in the context, and here it is made the central feature of the "mystery." Thus there is a real coherence in all references to the "mystery" in the Pauline Epistles, only that different aspects of it are emphasized in different places, and if we compare the earlier Epistles with the later we observe on the whole a tendency to give increasing emphasis to present experience in the church as a part of the revelation of the "mystery."

10. In 1 Cor. 27, 8 the "mystery" of the divine wisdom was concealed from "the rulers of this age" (i.e., the superhuman orders of being, the "world-rulers" of Eph. 612), when they brought about the crucifixion of Christ. Now the existence of the Christian Church, uniting the hostile sections of the human race in one body, is a plain proof which these "world-rulers" cannot ignore, that God is, in fact, summing up all things in Christ. Note here (1) the idea that the final cause of man's salvation lies outside man; it is the manifestation of God's manifold (many-sided) wisdom (as in 27 it is the demonstration of his grace); and (2) the cosmic interest, present also in 1¹⁰, as it is dominant in Colossians. This harmonizes the points of view of the two Epistles; in both the ultimate destination of the divine purpose is cosmic; but in Ephesians attention is in general fixed upon the critical stage of that purpose represented by the creation of the church.

13. The note of prayer returns; but it is probably to be understood as a prayer of Paul for himself (whether penned by him or put into his mouth). In 2 Cor. 47-18 Paul describes the terrible "afflictions" attending his work, but adds (v. 16) "we do not give in (or faint)." Now, an older man, and in prison, he prays (using the same terms) that he may not give in or faint in the face of greater afflictions.

14-21. Renewed Prayer and Adoration. Paraphrase: "And so I am praying for you to the Father of all, from whom all family life in heaven and earth derives its name and nature, that by the strength of the Divine Spirit and the indwelling of Christ you may be so deeply rooted in the love which binds his family together that you will apprehend the full scope of his love, and come to embody in your corporate life the full content of the divine nature. God can do for us things beyond all our imagining through his power working in us. To him be all praise in and through Christ, in and through the Christian society, for all generations!"

Having worked back through devious ways to his original point of departure ("prisoner for you Gentiles," v. 1, "tribulations [afflictions] for you," v. 13), the writer continues with the originally intended sequel to v. 1, his prayer for his readers. The R.V. somewhat obscures the articulation of the prayer. There are, first, three petitions: (a) for spiritual strength, (b) for the indwelling of Christ, (c) for moral stability (rooted and grounded in love, v. 17). Cf. the threefold prayer of Col. 19-11. On this follows (v. 18) the prayer for knowledge (life precedes knowledge and is its condition). This is the prayer to which he has been working up since 1¹⁶ (cf. 117-19). Lastly comes the final issue of it all—a consummation which cannot be confined to any one range of experience, whether moral or intellectual, but can only be defined in terms of God himself, the religious Absolute.

15. There is here a significant play upon words, for the Greek word used for family (patria) is derived from the word for father (pater). The etymological kinship of the words suggests a real kinship in idea: each family-group on earth is called by a name which recalls the one universal Father, and rightly recalls him, for he is the source of all true family relations.

18, 19. The four dimensions, with the word fullness (pleroma, on which see 12³, note), are echoes of current religious language of the period in Gnostic or mystical circles (cf. the mystery-language of Col. 119 28, 9, 18, and notes there). Originally the dimensions seem to have been thought of as those of the heavenly "house of Almighty God." Here, in association with pleroma, they convey the suggestion of absolute completeness and finality in religious experience, without inviting further definition. Such language is appropriate to the revelation of a "mystery," and yet it is used, in the spirit of Col. 126-29 (notes), of experience accessible to the simple believer in Christ. The important word is love. The kind of knowledge which is of ultimate worth is not intellectual apprehension of abstract principles, but personal apprehension of the love of Christ (i.e., the love that Christ has for us; cf. Rom. 835). This love passeth (or transcends) knowledge, probably not in the sense that love is a greater thing than knowledge (as in 1 Cor. 13²), but in the sense that it is too great to be fully known. We have, then, a paradox—a prayer for knowledge of that which is unknowable. But ultimate religious truth is often paradox to the logician. Note that the true knowledge is only to be enjoyed with all the saints, i.e., in the fellowship of the Christian society.

CHAPTER IV

1-16. The Christian Society: Unity Through Diversity of Function. Paraphrase: "I urge you therefore to live a life worthy of this great destiny; and above all to preserve the unity of the Christian society by love to one another. For the church is one, as being the organ of the one Spirit of God. God is one, the Source of all being; Christ is one, the Lord of our society; and we have a common faith and hope expressed in the common rite of baptism. The endowments we possess individually are derived from Christ—for, indeed, the very purpose of his incarnation and exaltation was that he might communicate the content of his own nature to man and the universe. Our endowments, therefore, are directly related to function within the society, as apostle, prophet, preacher of the gospel, or leader and teacher. The object of all such ministries is the consolidation of the society which is the body of Christ, and its growth to social maturity, i.e., to the point at which it fully expresses the whole of what Christ is. We must not be like helpless children, the sport of any chance external influence; we must grow up by affirming the truth in the practice of love. The standard and goal of our growth is, in fact, Christ, the Head of the society; and the body grows to maturity through the contribution made by every individual member in dependence on him."

From this point onward the Epistle is concerned with the presentation of Christianity as social ethics. The general form is hortatory, though there is much exposition of principles by the way. The present section deals with the conception of the Christian society as such, calling attention to its religious basis, and emphasizing the importance of individual endowment for function as contributing to the progress of the community.

3, 4. Unity of the Spirit is more than "unity of spirit" in our reduced sense of the phrase. It is a unity produced by the power of the Spirit of God in the lives of all its members. The best commentary is 1 Cor. 12⁴-14, 27, 28. "Inspiration," or possession by a spirit, was a common feature of religion at the time quite apart from Christianity. The Christian standpoint is that monotheism implies necessarily that all inspiration having religious value is produced by the one Spirit, the Spirit of God or of Christ. Thus the principle of social unity in the church is given in religious experience (cf. 2¹⁶, 18, notes).

7-10. A fresh stage in the argument begins with v. 7. Hitherto the emphasis has fallen on the unity of the social organism. Now it is to pass to the diversity of function by which this unity is made real. But the argument is complicated by the introduction (v. 8) of a piece of exegesis of the O.T. (Psa. 68¹⁸, quoted in a form different from our Hebrew text and from the LXX; the chief variation, from "received" to "gave," is known to follow a Jewish exegetical tradition). The parenthesis (vv. 9, 10) has the purpose of identifying what is spoken of in the psalm with the work of Christ. The descent into the lower parts of the earth is probably not the "descent into hell" of the Creed, but the incarnation itself regarded as a descent from "the heavenly places" to the earth as the lower plane of being (the form of words in the original would admit of such a rendering). That he might fill all things probably means more than that the purpose of the incarnation and ascension was to bring all things to completion. The suggestion is that by passing through all planes of being Christ is able to become immanent, as it were, in every part of the universe, and to fill it with the content of his own being (cf. Jer. 23²⁴). It is another aspect of the "summing-up" of 1¹⁰.

11-14. Paul returns after the parenthesis to the thought of v. 7, but with the ideas of vv. 9, 10 as a background. In furtherance of his purpose to "fill the universe" with himself, Christ endowed the church with ministries for its building up (v. 12), until it reaches the standard of the fullness (pleroma) of Christ (v. 13); i.e., until it perfectly realizes and expresses all that Christ is (as ultimately the universe will realize and express his fullness). This idea is set forth under the figure (already introduced in 12³ 2¹⁶ 4⁴) of a body (which crosses the figure of a building introduced in 2²⁰). A full-grown human body is a "mature" man—for such is the meaning of the word perfect (v. 12), which is, however, chosen with a side glance at its use in the sense of "fully initiated" (cf. Col. 1²⁸, note). The stature of the full-grown man is measured by the standard of all that Christ is (his fullness). It is thus suggested that "perfection" in the full sense is not anything to be attained by an isolated individual, but the goal of the Christian society (though in another sense each Christian is to be perfect: Col. 1²⁸).

15. The reference here is not to the duty of veracity in ordinary intercourse (which is introduced in v. 25), but to the affirmation of the truth (as opposed to the "wiles of error" in v. 14).

16. The basal idea is the same as in Col. 2¹⁹, but Ephesians brings into prominence the thought of individual function as a contribution to the growth of the whole. We thus get a very fine and full statement of the conception of a social organism.

17-24. The Christian Society the Moral Antipodes of Paganism. Paraphrase: "There must, therefore, be a clear and substantial distinction between the morals of the Christian society and those of paganism. There you have darkness, ignorance, alienation from the life of God, with consequent outrageous vices. That, as you know, is the exact reverse of all Christian teaching, which calls for a radical moral change—the abandonment of evil desires, a transformation of moral values, and the assumption of a new character exhibiting the divine ideal of righteousness, holiness, and truth."

As the account just given of the "social organism" provides the positive basis of Christian ethics, so the present section serves to define them negatively by contrast with the prevailing practice of the pagan world.

18, 19. Cf. Col. 121. But the best commentary is Rom. 121-32. There we are told that because men willfully rejected the knowledge of God (cf. ignorance, v. 18) and gave themselves over to futility (the vanity of v. 17) God abandoned them in their lusts (cf. v. 22) to "impurity" (the lasciviousness and uncleanliness of v. 19) and to the anti-social sins (the greediness of v. 19, and cf. note on v. 3). As in Romans the "senseless heart" is "darkened," the "reasonings" are "vain," and the "reason" is "reprobate," so it is here. The phrase, hardening of their heart, does not mean quite what that phrase means to us; for the "heart" is for a Jewish thinker the seat of the intelligence even more than of the emotions (see p. 1156a). The degradation of the reasoning faculties goes hand in hand with moral corruption.

20, 21. Cf. Col. 26. In Jesus as distinct from "in Christ" (if it is more than a stylistic variation) may carry an implicit reference to "the Jesus of History," in accordance with Paul's general usage of the names.

22-24. Cf. Col. 39. Rom. 122. In Paul's psychology the mind, or "reason," is the higher part of man in his natural state (=the "inner man," Rom. 722-25). It is capable of knowing God, but becomes "reprobate" through sin (Rom. 128). In order that it may be a sure guide to truth and right, it must be renewed or "transformed" by the infusion of the Spirit. For the new man, and his "creation," cf. 215, note.

25-32. Ethics of the Christian Society. See also 51-20. Paraphrase: "In actual practice the distinctive Christian ethic will work out in such ways as the following: Speak the truth. Do not let anger lead you into sin. Do not enrich yourselves by dishonest means, but by hard work at honorable trades earn enough to contribute to the needs of others. Avoid all foul speech; it is offensive to the Divine Spirit. Let what you say be helpful to others. Get rid of all bitter, abusive, and malicious talk. Be kind and pitiful, and forgive as God forgave you."

From 425 to 69 we have the application of the broad principles of Christian ethics already laid down, namely, the principle of the social organism and the revolt against pagan immorality. These principles are applied in reverse order, the former finding its place in 521-69. We begin here with the opposition of Christian virtues to certain flagrant sins of paganism. In 425-32 (see also 51, 2), truth of intercourse, placability, honest industry, purity and propriety of speech, and the social virtues of compassion and forgiveness are set against their contrary vices.

A good deal of the same material is present in a less ordered form in Col. 35-17, but this (with 51-21) is a more sustained attempt to set forth a plan of Christian ethics as applied to social life, and as such may be compared to Rom. 12, 13. The style of all such passages (cf. 1 Thess. 41-12 512-24 Gal. 513-610) has a certain uniform character, unlike Paul's usual manner. It is probable that this was the recognized form of ethical instruction in the early church. It recalls the Wisdom literature of the O.T., the Epistle of James, the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, and in some respects the sayings of Jesus as we have them in the Synoptic Gospels. The present passage is the most elaborate expansion of the common form, and contains important original elements contributed by the writer, particularly in the assignment of definitely Christian motives. But even here the treatment is exemplary rather than systematic or complete.

26. Cf. Ps. 44. The first half of the clause is concessive, in accordance with Hebrew idiom. Therefore read Though you be angry, do not sin. The meaning is that an instinctive impulse to anger is natural and not necessarily sinful; to brood over it is to "give the devil his chance." This is true psychology, and only a pedantic interpretation would find a contradiction to 431 or Col. 38 or Mt. 522. The advice not to cherish anger after sunset goes back to the Pythagoreans. It is excellent practical psychology.

28. Note the motive for labor. There is here an advance on 2 Thess. 36-12. Throughout the N.T. it is assumed that all Christians have a claim upon the economic resources of the community according to their need (cf. Rom. 1527). This was the basis of the "communism" of the early days (Acts 244-47 432-35). The writer is perhaps taking warning from the fate of the Jerusalem church (for which Paul had to collect alms among the churches of Asia and Greece) in impressing upon his readers the necessity of honest labor to replenish the common stock.

32. Connect with 51, 2.

CHAPTER V

1-20. The Ethics of the Christian Society. (425-32 continued.) Paraphrase: "Love, as Christ loved you—to the point of sacrifice. Sexual immorality, with all that accompanies it, is of course unthinkable in a holy community. There is no place in the ultimate divine Society either for sexual vice or for grasping self-assertion, which is no better than idolatry.

Let no specious arguments lead you astray on this point. There is an ultimate difference between darkness and light: you belong to the light; you must exercise your moral discernment. Have nothing to do with the dark ways of paganism, but bring everything out into the light. You remember the hymn:

'Sleeper awake!
Rise from the dead!
And Christ will dawn upon you.'

Use discretion and common sense, and make the best use of your time. Avoid the false excitement of intoxication; drink your fill of the Divine Spirit; and when you want to sing, sing praise to God."

In vv. 3-14 the two root-sins of paganism, impurity and grasping self-assertion, are explicitly condemned in all their forms. Vv. 15-20 inculcate conscientious sobriety of judgment and the right sublimation of those instinctive impulses which when perverted lead to intemperance.

1, 2. There is no break at 4³², which demands these two verses for the completion of the sense. Here the full Christian motive comes to noblest expression.

3. This verse seems clearly to allude to a classification of vices widely current among pagan and Jewish moralists of the period. The classification is in two groups: (1) sins of the flesh, under the head of "intemperance" (or, as here, uncleanness); and (2) anti-social sins, under the head of covetousness (as here, pleonexia in the Greek), grasping self-assertion regardless of the rights of others (the "greediness" of 4¹⁹). Paul follows this classification in a general way when he has occasion to give anything like a catalogue of sins (see Rom. 124-32 1 Cor. 510, 11 2 Cor. 1220, 21 Gal. 519-21 Col. 35, 8). In 4¹⁹, however, pleonexia (covetousness) is brought into such close connection with "impurity" as almost to lead to the suggestion that the two great typical sins have, after all, one common root (cf. 1 Thess. 44-6). That pleonexia is a form of idolatry (v. 5; cf. Col. 35) is in harmony with known teaching of the Jewish rabbis (cf. also Mt. 624).

5. For the implications of inheritance see Col. 112, 13, note.

6. For the significance of wrath see 22, 3, note.

8-14. Light is a natural and universal religious symbol. In the thought of Paul it is specially associated with the idea of "the coming age" (see Col. 112, 13, note). Christians are children of light (cf. 1 Thess. 55) as belonging to the new order of the kingdom of God. In what follows there is a varying play on other senses of the word "light," especially as signifying that which makes things manifest or visible, and so as the symbol of divine revelation of truth (so v. 10, with which cf. Col. 19 Rom. 122 Phil. 19).

11. Not reprove, but "expose," "show up"; not necessarily in word, but by the whole attitude to life.

13. The last sentence is difficult. We should expect, "Whatever makes manifest is light"; but it is doubtful if the verb in the original could possibly have that sense, and, in any case, the statement would not be very pointed. But the word "light" is used not only of that which illumines, but of that which is illumined (as the "light and shade" of a picture; cf. Shakespeare's "How soft the moonlight sleeps upon this bank"). Sin itself is darkness, but the recognition of sin is a part of the light of the kingdom of God; and in this sense it might be said that whatever is made manifest belongs to the realm of light (cf. 1 Jn. 15-7, note).

14. Probably a quotation from an early Christian hymn, of the kind alluded to in v. 19.

15. Cf. Col. 45.

18. In many forms of religion (particularly in orgiastic cults of this period associated with Dionysus) intoxication is regarded as a means of communion with the Divine. Hence it is here opposed to the condition of true inspiration. (Cf. Lk. 115; Odes of Solomon 117: "I drank and was inebriated with the living water that doth not die; and my inebriation was not without knowledge; but I forsook vanity and I turned to the Most High my God.") Inspiration, or possession by the Divine Spirit, finds natural expression in poetry and song. How little the writer thinks of religion as an unemotional matter of pure reason or pedestrian morals!—This passage and the parallel in Col. 316 afford interesting evidence of the production of a poetical literature in early Christianity.

21-33. Christian Ethics in the Home. (See also 61-9.) Paraphrase: "Mutual subordination is the rule of the Christian society. Thus, wives should subordinate themselves to their husbands, and husbands should love their wives to the point of sacrifice. Marriage is a sacrament of the love of Christ for the holy community."

The treatment of household duties here (and in 61-9) is closely parallel to Col. 318-41. See notes there.

21-24. The participle subjecting should be translated as an imperative. (This grammatical usage of late Greek, unknown to the Revisers, but revealed by recent discovery, clears up many places where Paul's grammar looked odd.) When this is realized, then it becomes clear that in grammar no less than in sense this verse makes a fresh departure. The dominant motive of the last sections has been the contrast of Christian morality with pagan immorality. This motive now disappears, and we recur to the positive conception of a Christian society developed in 41-16. One mark of it will be mutual subordination. In v. 22 the author brings under this general head the subordination of women, which is stated absolutely in Col. 3¹⁸. It cannot, however, be said that he carries the idea through consistently. Really, the attitude of wife to husband is simple subjection, as absolute as the subjection of the church to Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 11^{3, 7}), who is her Saviour. (We are probably not intended to find a parallel to this in the marital relation.)

25-33. The doctrine of Christian marriage, as set forth here, is based on a far-reaching application of the quasi-mystical idea that the relation of husband and wife represents that of Christ and the church. As regards the attitude of wife to husband, the application has already been made. Here follows a fuller exposition, having for its purpose the definition of the relation of a husband to his wife.

26. The sacrament of baptism is described as washing of water with the word (read a water-bath accompanied by a word). There is the act of immersion and there is utterance which gives it meaning—probably either the baptismal formula or the confession of faith (cf. 1 Pet. 12⁵ 1 Cor. 6¹¹). This constitutes the sacrament of sanctification, for in it the believer is dedicated to God. For the connection of baptism with the death of Christ see Rom. 6¹⁻¹¹.

27. The ideal and final perfection of the church is regarded as given in the initial act of sanctification. In pursuance of the figure of marriage, the motive of Christ in giving himself is represented as the counterpart of the lover's desire to enjoy the beauty of his beloved (cf. 2 Cor. 11²).

28-31. The comparison is complicated by the introduction at v. 28 of a fresh element. We now have three relations which are treated as analogous or identical: (a) Husband—Wife; (b) Christ—Church; (c) Person—Body. We have already learned that (a)=(b); we are now to be shown (vv. 28, 29a) that (a)=(c); then we learn (v. 29b) that (b)=(c); fortified by the recognition of this identity, we are prepared to see a deeper meaning in (a)=(c), which is now restated. It might have been enough for Paul's purpose to show that marriage, according to nature and Scripture (Gen. 2²⁴, cited in v. 31), is so intimate a union that any default of love is at once unnatural and impious; but this would be for him a bald abstraction, lacking the cogency of the Christian motive; hence he brings in that mystical relation which makes us members of Christ's body, the church, which is also his bride.

32. Mystery, according to Greek usage, implies an ineffable truth and its symbolic manifestation. In any particular case it is doubtful whether the word is applied specifically to the symbol or the truth symbolized. Here the subject-matter is the marriage relation described in the words of Gen. 2²⁴. Either Paul says that marriage is itself a sublime symbol, or he says that the truth symbolized in it is sublime. His probable meaning is: "This marriage relation is a sublime symbol; and I interpret it in reference to Christ and his church. However, putting that aside for the moment, it is clear that the individual Christian must love his wife as he loves himself." The passage is made the scriptural basis of the Catholic doctrine of marriage as a sacrament.

CHAPTER VI

1-9. Christian Ethics in the Home. (521-33 continued.) Paraphrase: "Children should obey their parents as they would obey Christ. Parents must not exasperate their children by scolding, but give them a really Christian training. Slaves must obey their masters as they would obey Christ, and do their work with a sense of direct personal responsibility to him. Masters must treat their slaves in exactly the same spirit, for they too are slaves of Christ."

See note on household duties immediately following the paraphrase of 521-33.

1-4. Children—parents. See on Col. 320, 21.

5-9. Servants—masters. See on Col. 322-41.

10-18. The Christian Warfare. Paraphrase: "For the rest, be armed and well prepared for the fight against the spiritual forces of evil. Put on the divine armor—truth for belt, righteousness for breastplate, readiness to affirm the gospel for shoes, faith for shield, and the inspired word of God for sword. Watch and pray."

Behind this passage lies the idea, so constant in Jewish eschatology, of the Last War, in which the powers of good should finally vanquish the powers of evil (often referred to in the revived eschatology of to-day as "Armageddon," after Rev. 16¹⁶, which see). This war is depicted in crude colors in 2 Thess. 16-9 23-12. In 1 Cor. 15²⁴⁻²⁶ the conception is more spiritual. Here it is fully "sublimated." The enemy is no "man of sin"—no human adversary at all, but the spiritual powers called (after Jewish usage) "Princedoms" and "Powers," or (after pagan usage) "World-rulers," but, in any case, only half-personified in the writer's thought, since the comprehensive term used is the neuter expression spiritual hosts of wickedness (read spiritual forces of evil, v. 12). The belief in a period of final warfare in history survives in the phrase the evil day (v. 13); but with scarcely more than a shadow of its old realism. In effect the writer is speaking of that perpetual struggle with evil which in its various phases always lies before the Christian. It is the "substitute for war in the moral sphere." (Cf. pp. 206-7, 846b.)

In the imaginative description of the spiritual armor which follows, the writer is expanding a figure already found in Rom. 13¹² 1 Thess. 5⁸, with the aid of reminiscences of Isa. 11⁴, 5 59¹⁷ Wisdom 5¹⁸. In all these passages God is the Warrior, and the armor of God (vv. 11, 13) here probably starts from the meaning of the armor worn by God, and so also by those who have "put on Christ." The shoes (v. 15) are suggested by Isa. 52⁷; gospel of peace is peculiarly appropriate to this Epistle. For the word (not, of course, the canon of Scripture) as sword, cf. Isa. 11⁴ Heb. 4¹²; a cruder form of the same idea is in 2 Thess. 2⁸ Rev. 2¹⁶. Finally, the ceaseless watching (v. 18) to which the soldier is bound is associated with prayer (supplication) as in Mk. 14³⁸ (cf. Col. 4²).

19-24. Personal Matters and Conclusion. Paraphrase: "In your prayers pray for me, that, prisoner as I am, I may declare the secret of God with complete frankness. Tychicus will give you news of me. Farewell."

The personalia are scanty and perfunctory. Greetings are entirely lacking. For news of the writer the readers are referred, as in Colossians, to Tychicus, the bearer of the letter (v. 21).

20. Paul speaks of himself as an ambassador for Christ in 2 Cor. 5²⁰. Now he is in prison, but an ambassador still (cf. Philemon, v. 9).

24. Uncorruptness is for Paul elsewhere the antithesis to "corruption" in the sense of mortality or perishableness (cf. Rom. 27 1 Cor. 15⁴², 50-54). It is difficult to give the word here the ethical sense of "sincerity," which, in fact, does not seem to be anywhere found. Paul holds that the Christian is "risen with Christ" into a life already essentially immortal. Thus his love for Christ is no mere feeling of the natural, mortal human soul, but a spiritual affection "in the heavenly places."

PHILIPPIANS

By PROFESSOR JAMES ALEX. ROBERTSON

INTRODUCTION

The City of Philippi. The tenderest of all Paul's letters is addressed to the church in Philippi. Philippi was the first European town to be evangelized by the great apostle. It was situated on the Via Egnatia—the great Roman road which stretched from Dyrhachium on the Adriatic to Byzantium on the Hellespont. Krēnidēs was its original name, derived from the springs which abounded in the neighborhood; but the great Philip of Macedon renamed it after himself. Gold was found in the adjoining mountains and Philip coveted it. An important battle was fought in the plains of Philippi in 42 B.C., when the Emperor Octavianus defeated the republican forces. Octavianus established a military colony there, with special privileges. Philippi was also a great religious center; the chief shrine of Dionysos was in the neighboring mountain Pangæus. At the time of the apostle the religious activities there were part of the world-wide yearning for redemption from the futility of life. Aratos the poet wrote his poem Concerning Nature in Macedonia. And in it he sang,

"All the ways are full of God,
All the gathering-places of men, the sea, and harbors;
And at every turn we are all in need of God,
For we are all of kin to him."

The last line Paul quoted once in Athens (Acts 17²⁸).

Paul and Philippi. Paul was drawn to Philippi in the course of what is known as his second missionary journey. All along his way through Asia something—perhaps it was already the call of the distant field of Europe, through some representative—hindered him from turning aside to other near-hand centers. And at Troas at length he saw the vision of the man from Macedonia calling, "Come over and help us." The conjecture has been made by Ramsay that Luke was the instigator in all this. For (1) it is here in the course of this narrative in Acts (ch. 16) that the "we" passages most clearly emerge; which means that Luke was now in Paul's company. (2) The description of Philippi, here in Acts, suggests that Luke or his family originally belonged to this city. Luke calls it "Philippi, which is a city of Macedonia, the first of the district, a colony." Of no other town has he so full a description. Now, we know that Philippi was not universally regarded as "the first city" of the district. Luke, therefore, is taking sides in a dispute here. Who more likely to do so than a former citizen, jealous for his city's status? (3) Luke is familiar also with certain details about the place. He knows that the Roman governors there were called strategoi, or prætors. Particularly he seems to know that there was a small group of Jews and proselytes who used to worship in the open air in the vicinity of the town. "On the Sabbath day we went forth without the gate by a river side, where we supposed there was a place of prayer." That well attested reading, "we supposed," suggests that Luke had been aware from early recollections of these religious ongoing. (4) Further, in the narrative of Acts, when Paul passed on from Philippi to other towns, the "we" passages cease for the time being. Luke had been left behind to consolidate the work there, and perhaps became the leader of the little Christian community. At least, we do not find him in Paul's company again until five years have elapsed. (On the "we" passages, see intro. to Acts, p. 1095a.)

All this suggests a possible solution of one of the difficulties in the letter to Philippi. When, toward the end, Paul pleads for the reconciliation of two women who had differed in the congregation, he adds, "Yea, I beseech thee also, true yokefellow, help these women." Who was this yokefellow? Many conjectures have been made. (a) Clement of Alexandria, Erasmus, Zwingli, etc., think Paul refers to his own wife, whom Renan conjectures to have been Lydia, the Asiatic proselyte who was the first to be won there for Christ by Paul—a very improbable conjecture, since the word is masculine in form, and Paul himself claims to have been unmarried (1 Cor. 7⁷). (b) Others suppose it to be the husband of one of the women referred to. But the word obviously means that it was a yoke shared with the apostle. (c) This colleague in labor with the apostle seems to have been a pastor or teacher in Philippi. It can hardly have been Epaphroditus, for he was with Paul at the moment of writing. It cannot have been Timothy, who was also with Paul at the time; nor Barnabas, who was never associated with Paul in Philippi. Silas, who was with Paul on his first visit to Philippi, is a possible conjecture, only we have no hint that he was near Philippi at this time. (d) Luke, however, was apparently not with Paul at this time. And we know from the letter that the Philippians probably had some previous communication from Paul. Was the messenger Luke? There is no more likely place to which Luke could have gone than this town with which he had had such a long and honorable connection. (e) Lastly, the word "yokefellow" indicates a closer connection with the apostle than "fellow worker." There is none of Paul's immediate circle whom it fits so well as Luke.

The only hypothesis that seriously stands in the way of this identification is that syzygos, the word translated "yokefellow," may be a proper name. In favor of it is the use with the word of the adjective "true" or "genuine," as if the apostle were saying, "Syzygos, for you are genuinely worthy of your name." But that interpretation is not inevitable, the more so as no such proper name is found in Greek.

The Genuineness of the Letter. It was Baur of Tübingen who first seriously challenged its genuineness, and as he has said most that can be said against it, we may first summarize his arguments, and then consider their validity. (1) The mention of bishops and deacons is said to be an anachronism in a letter of Paul. (2) The Clement referred to in the letter is held by Baur to be Clement of Rome, who belongs to a later period than Paul. (3) The letter is said to misunderstand Paul's monetary transactions with Philippi. (4) The style is held to be un-Pauline, especially in its marked subjectivity of feeling. (5) Certain doctrinal objections are adduced. The great passage about the incarnation (25-11) is held to be Gnostic.

None of these objections are really serious. As to (1), Haupt, following Chrysostom, suggests that the two words stand for the same persons—those who had had the oversight of the arrangements in collecting and sending the gift to Paul which this letter speaks of. That is probably making too little of the terms. But the opposite extreme must be avoided. The fact that "bishops" is plural shows that there was more than one holding this position in the community. "Bishops" were practically equivalent to "presbyters" in the earliest days of the church; both terms were applied to those who because of their long standing as Christians were looked up to as grave and reverend seniors. As for the deacons, even women sometimes held that office in Paul's day. It must be remembered that the words are plastic and indefinite, implying little of their later signification (see discussion, pp. 1277-8).

(2) There is no real reason for identifying the Clement mentioned with Clement of Rome. It is said that when the writer speaks of Paul's bonds being manifest in Christ throughout the prætorium, and sends a salutation from them of Cæsar's household, he is probably thinking, among others, of Flavius Clemens, a kinsman of Domitian, who was put to death as an atheist, a charge often levelled at Christians. But the ground for identifying Flavius Clemens with Clemens Romanus is very flimsy. Nor can either be identified with the Clement of Philippians, for the greetings from members of Cæsar's household could not include Clement's, seeing he was already in Philippi. (3) The supposed contradiction about monetary matters is got by pitting 415^f. against 1 Cor. 915. But in the letter to Corinth Paul is not asserting that he received no help from any church; he only says he waived his right for good reasons with regard to the Corinthian church. In 2 Cor. 117, ⁹ he admits receiving help from others, and from Macedonia. (4) With regard to the question of style, the subjectivity of Philippians is explained by the very nature and circumstances of the letter. With no other church were Paul's relations so personal: this letter has sometimes been called the love letter of Paul. It has also been called "the Epistle of Humility," for he is writing to urge upon them, by word and example, that humility which leads to unity, as well as to express his thanks brimming over with love for help received. True, it is not one of the great doctrinal epistles, and yet it contains the important passage about the incarnation and self-emptying of Christ (25-11). The letter is the spontaneous outflow of a heart of grateful love. (5) The supposed traces of Gnosticism are easily explained. It is not a case of this writer borrowing from the Gnostics, but of the Gnostics borrowing from Paul; and it is absurd to find in the word "prize" or "thing to be grasped," which Paul uses in the incarnation passage, a kinship with the wild theories of such a Gnostic as Valentinus, who taught that the power Sophia (wisdom) sought to penetrate the essence of the All-Father; and to find in the phrase "in the likeness of men" a docetic meaning (i.e., a denial of the reality of Jesus' human body), or to parallel "He emptied himself" with the Gnostic phrase, "to be in the Kenoma" (the empty Void). On the other hand, Gnostics would not call Jesus "Lord"; nor would they assign a body to the exalted Christ or to glorified believers.

The external evidence for the genuineness of the letter is strong. Clement of Rome (95

A.D.), and Ignatius and Polycarp, early in the second century, all echo its phraseology.

Integrity and Unity of the Letter. Is the letter a single whole, or does it consist of fragments of separate letters? When Paul says, "To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not irksome but for you it is safe," we do have a hint of more than one letter to the Philippians, but no proof that we have fragments of two letters here joined together. What follows is not a repetition of anything in the earlier part of the letter. It is probably a previous letter to which Paul is referring. Nor does the phrase translated "finally" (31) necessarily imply that Paul is here ending one letter and that what follows is part of another. The phrase does mark a transition from a general to a special part of the letter perhaps. The letter is so artless and natural that the apostle may have intended to draw to a conclusion at this point, when another train of thought started in his mind, and set him off writing at considerable length again. Lightfoot conjectures an interruption in the process of writing; and that when Paul resumed he found he had something more to say.

Where was the Letter Written? This question has given rise to various conjectures. Corinth has been suggested, but without any adequate reason. Ephesus has more recently been thought of. But while there may be certain grounds for suggesting that Paul was once imprisoned in Ephesus, it can scarcely have been for any lengthy period. The main dispute is still between the claims of Rome and Cæsarea. The letter indicates that Paul was imprisoned in close confinement, and waiting an impending trial. Both Rome and Cæsarea answer to these requirements. The reference to the prætorium (113) might be said to hold good of either place, for the dwelling of Herod in Cæsarea was sometimes called the prætorium. In Rome the word was not applied to the emperor's palace; it would be either the judgment hall of the prætor, or the barracks of the imperial lifeguards, or a collective name for these soldiers who kept watch and ward over the apostle.

A more decisive phrase is the phrase "Cæsar's household," near the end of the letter. That cannot refer to Herod's retinue, and it is unlikely that it should be applied to slave-groups outside Rome. But the most decisive argument is the situation in which the apostle finds himself at the time of the writing of the letter. The decision of the law court which Paul was awaiting was evidently a life or death decision. This points to the final issue of his appeal to Cæsar. Again, he has a certain freedom in his present situation, such as he scarcely possessed in Cæsarea. He is in contact with a large and active church (114-17). There was not such a church in Cæsarea. He is receiving visitors (418), dispatching messengers (219-30), and entertaining friends (421f.). All the evidence therefore seems to point to Rome.

Date of the Letter. It is one of the Imprisonment Epistles. Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon were also written from Rome. Is Philippians to be placed before or after these? Lightfoot admits that several communications must have passed between Paul in Rome and the church at Philippi: (1) One from Rome to Philippi announcing Paul's arrival in Rome. (2) One from Philippi to Rome accompanying the gift sent at the hands of Epaphroditus. (3) One from Rome to Philippi—word of Epaphroditus' illness. (4) A letter of inquiries from Philippi—a letter which seems to have asked (a) about Paul's prospects (112), in a prayerful spirit (119); whether he was likely soon to visit them (125f.), if Epaphroditus was better (226); and it may have apologized for not sending help sooner (410f.). All this implies a considerable stay in Rome before the sending of this letter. But the main argument for a later date than the other imprisonment epistles, in spite of the letter's affinity with earlier letters, is that obviously Paul is on the verge of a great crisis in his affairs. His trial is imminently impending. No doubt he is still hopeful for his release (125-224), but he is far from buoyant about it. His hope is fixed not on earthly helpers. He argues that the Disposer of all events will recognize his indispensableness to the Philippians. But that argument would not have any weight in a law court. Indeed, Paul also prepares his friends in this letter for the possibility of the other alternative being fulfilled—his execution. It was written therefore somewhere between 62-64 A.D.

Condition of the Philippian Church. (1) The Philippian Christians were able once more to show their love for the apostle by a generous gift. Paul recognizes their constant thoughtfulness, but for a time they lacked opportunity (419). The fact that Paul, so jealous about his independence, was willing to receive bounty at their hands shows the close personal bond of affection that existed between him and this church. (2) There were possibilities of persecution in their environment. Paul had offended a certain section of the community by interfering with their means of livelihood and for this he had suffered imprisonment at Philippi (Acts 1611f.). They had sought to kindle pagan prejudice against him by calling him a Jew. So the Gentile environment had become hostile. We can see this fact influencing the course of the letter, when Paul exhorts the Christians to show a united front to their adversaries (127-30). Suffering must not daunt nor disintegrate them. (3) But we see, already mingling with this, another feature of the church life at Philippi. There is a certain disunity or disharmony among them which Paul is anxious should be healed (127 21-11, 14 43, 8, 9). He urges the duties of harmony and fellow feeling. Perhaps it was due to spiritual pride or vain-glory, for Paul in a noble passage urges the imitation of the humility of Christ. The danger of internal friction is still present in his mind at 31st. And in the end of the letter he urges two prominent women to be reconciled. (See p. 942b.)

Analysis of the Letter. (1) The letter opens with the usual salutation, thanksgiving and prayer, characteristic of Paul's writings, but considerably prolonged in this letter (11-11).

(2) Then, probably in answer to inquiries, he explains his personal situation, and the progress of the gospel in spite of rivalry and opposition (112-26).

(3) Apparently in response to information received, he goes on to urge them to manifest harmony by an absence of self-seeking (127-24).

(4) And there follows the noblest passage in the letter in which he puts forward the example of Christ, urging them to copy it (25-16).

(5) He returns to personalia, speaking of plans for his own freedom, if God will; his intention to send Timothy; the illness and return of Epaphroditus (217-30).

(6) Then he seems to begin his final injunctions (31), but either an interruption occurred, or a new train of thought is started in his mind, and he inserts some warnings (a) against formalism (the Judaizers) (33-11), (b) against spiritual pride (312-16), passing into antinomianism or lawlessness (317-41), the extreme dangers to which Paul found Christianity prone.

(7) Resuming final injunctions, he makes his personal appeal to Euodia and Syntyche (42, 3).

(8) There follows an exhortation to joy, carefreeness, and lofty moral endeavor (44-9).

(9) He concludes by thanking them for their gift (410-20).

(10) And with salutations the letter ends (421-23).

Bibliography: Commentaries: Lightfoot; Vincent (International Critical Commentary); M. Jones (Westminster Commentary); Kennedy, in Expositor's Greek Testament; Moule, Philippian Studies. Christological: Bruce, Humiliation of Christ; Gore, Bampton Lectures On the Incarnation; Forsyth, Person and Place of Jesus Christ. General: Moffatt, Introduction to Literature of N.T.; Peake, Introduction to N.T.; Ramsay, Paul the Traveller; Deissmann, St. Paul; Weinle, St. Paul, the Man and his Work.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Salutation. Timothy was probably the amanuensis. He had been associated with Paul in his earlier contacts with Philippi (see intro.). Paul does not call himself here by the more usual designation, apostle; the letter is artless and affectionate; he describes his vocation as the slave of Christ, in whose service is perfect freedom. He addresses the saints in Philippi in Christ Jesus, the consecrated ones, God's chosen people. There is a contrast between earthly location and spiritual status. Many social advantages may depend on location in a particular community, but the supreme spiritual privilege of being in Christ does not. And how often he uses that word all in the letter (14, 7, 8, 25, 217, 26 421). He is anxious to show he is not going to discriminate between any possible sects or factions in the church at Philippi. For the phrase with the bishops and deacons, see introduction.

In v. 2 the Greek and Hebrew forms of greeting are combined, fine examples of how Christ makes all things new. It must have been Christ who restored new life to the worn-out coin grace, and to peace—colorless and gray like a hillside after sunset. It was God saying, "My favor to you," as he renewed his glad tidings every morning through the Master; God saying, "Peace to you"—the middle wall of enmity broken down in Jesus. God is the ultimate source of spiritual blessing, and Christ the channel. The two names are set side by side without incongruity.

3-11. Thanksgiving and Prayer. Paul reverts to the first person singular. Though Timothy writes, the letter is in no sense a joint production, but a purely personal outpouring of love and gratitude. My God—God "whose I am and whom I serve" (Acts 27²³). "The suppliant thanks while he asks, and blesses as he petitions." Thankfulness with joy runs like an undertone through the whole letter. Bengel says the sum and substance of the Epistle is "I rejoice: do ye rejoice." The occasion of his thanksgiving is not "your fellowship with each other in the gospel": he could hardly praise them for their unity; nor yet "your participation in the blessing of the gospel": that would be too obvious; but it is your fellowship [with me] in furtherance of the gospel (v. 5). There is perhaps a hint of their monetary contribution—the "now" suggests that; but it was more: it was their community of interest and sympathy with him in the gospel. God is described as He which began a good work in you (v. 6). "Began" is a technical term from Greek religion, used of initiating a ritual. If it is a sacrificial metaphor, then "a good work" is the Philippians' self-sacrificing conduct in relation to Paul; but it may be more general—the production of spiritual life in them. Will perfect it continues the ritual metaphor: he who initiated the process will complete the initiation (cf. Gal. 3³). The day of Jesus Christ (v. 10) is a Christianized O.T. expression. "The day of the Lord" is in the O.T. the day of God's visitation of the earth in judgment and redemption. Christ, in the N.T., is to be the Judge. The Second Advent is prominent in Paul's earliest letters, and it is not absent, as we see here, from his latest. Paul regarded it as imminent (1 Thess. 4¹⁷; but cf. 1 Cor. 15⁵¹ Phil. 12³).

7. The thought of the Philippians for Paul (manifested in their gift) is answered by Paul's thought for them, his hopes of their religious prospects. In my bonds describes Paul's immediate situation; in my defense refers to his impending trial. This is the great crisis in his affairs which hangs like a shadow over all the letter. Confirmation stands for the guarantee of the value of the gospel which such a defense would afford. The grace here is the entire grace of God.

8. The last phrase is an intensified form of Paul's favorite phrase "in Christ"; "in the heart of Christ" it might be rendered. "In the breast of Paul," says Bengel, "it was not so much his own as Christ's heart that beat." Paul believed that his affection for the Philippians was just a pulse-beat of a mightier love than his.

9-11. Paul's prayer for the Philippians. Your love is to be taken either as love absolute—love to God and men—or more probably as love to one another, for that was somewhat lacking in Philippi. There was about the Philippians a certain eager enthusiasm which was apt to carry them just a little beyond the bounds of spiritual common sense. I pray that your love may get cleared eyes, he says.

The cause of Christ occasionally suffers from the impetuous enthusiast. The cure for this is not less love and more sense, but a truer love, says Paul. It is the highest and holiest love that has clearest eyes. As our love grows we become more and more sensitive to the wise and searching eyes of God, and therefore more and more alive to the things that matter. Knowledge is clear insight into the heart and mind of God, a grasp of the great principles of religion, ability to read the thoughts of the Eternal. And judgment, or sense, or moral discernment is power to apply those thoughts of eternity to the facts of life, to know how to approve the things that are excellent or to "prove the things that differ." This last is perhaps the better rendering, for discrimination is the function of discernment (cf. Rom. 2¹⁸). The two words sincere and offense- less correspond exactly to knowledge and discernment. Sincerity is transparency, perfect openness toward God. According to one derivation the word for "sincere" means "sun-tested." You turn up a stone, and the insects beneath scuttle away into the dark again, unable to endure the strong sunlight. Sincerity is sensitiveness to the awful holiness and be-setting inexorable love of God. Only so do our lives become less of a stumbling-block to men.

Righteousness in the phrase the fruits of righteousness (v. 11) is again a right relation between God and the soul. It is something that God gives in (or through) Christ. "Only so far as the life of the believer is absorbed in the life of Christ, does the righteousness of Christ become his own" (Lightfoot). See the parable of the vine and the branches (Jn. 15¹¹).

12-26. Messages Concerning Paul's Personal Situation. I would have you know is a frequent formula in ancient letters, and betokens probably that Paul is writing in answer to inquiries. Rather contains a hint that the Philippians were expecting different news—"rather than what you suppose." The gospel has been furthered by Paul's fetters in Christ, i.e., fetters incurred on account of his relation to Christ. For praetorian guard see introduction. Probably it refers to the body of men rather than to any building. That conforms best with the phrase which follows, to all the rest—i.e., to the wider circle of the city itself, in particular to the Christians in Rome. Though the R.V. takes in the Lord with the brethren, (v. 14), it is perhaps better to take it with being confident. "The brethren" already means "the Christians," and "the Christians in Christ" would be tautological. In Christ (v. 13): Christ is the region or landscape in which they now move and think. Through my bonds is a strange reason for men's daring to give utterance to the word of God. The very fact that Paul was in chains for the gospel's sake was a testimony to its power.

15. Some can scarcely refer to the minority already indicated, for this party also preached the gospel. They were not the Judaizers; Paul always utterly repudiates the Judaizers and all their works. On their view Christ had died in vain; but this party preaches Christ. Because of Paul's success the influence of this party which had hitherto enjoyed a special prominence had faded: this was their grievance. They resented his presence in Rome, even in fetters. The word for strife means "rivalry." They imagined Paul would feel bitterly the activities of rivals. The gospel had come to Rome before Paul, and some of its first promulgators were making claims to priority.

16-18. Notice that in R.V. vv. 16, 17 stand in reversed order to that of A.V. I am set (v. 16) like a soldier posted on guard by his captain. Defense does not refer to his defense before Nero's tribunal, but his whole propaganda on behalf of Christ. Faction is worthless self-seeking—ambition. There is, says Lightfoot, a moral contradiction between "ambition" and "Christ." Yet even if his opponents increase his sufferings by adding gall to his wounds (the meaning of v. 17b), no matter, so Christ is proclaimed. In pretense or in truth (v. 18) represents not difference in substance but in purpose of preaching. Therein I rejoice, says Paul. This verse was quoted in the early church in favor of heretics. It raises the question, Are unconverted men warranted or qualified to preach the gospel? We cannot argue a general rule from such an exceptional case. Undoubtedly, the correct principle is that the best preparation for preaching Christ is to have his Spirit.

19, 20. My salvation is not to be taken narrowly as Paul's release from prison. The supply of the Spirit has nothing to do with his liberation, only with his soul's health. The supply of Christ's Spirit is in answer to their prayer: a noble indication of the humility of Paul: he expresses himself here as dependent on the prayers of others. The reference is not to the spirit of unshakable steadfastness which possessed Jesus when he walked the earth in the midst of his sufferings, but to the Holy Spirit. The Spirit is both giver and gift. Paul often practically identifies the Holy Spirit with Christ (cf. 1 Cor. 12⁴, 5 2 Cor. 3¹⁷). The bestowal of salvation is an act of the exalted Christ who works in the Spirit. Earnest expectation (v. 20) is literally a desire with head stretched out and away from other things, and hope is expectation combined with assurance. There is probably a looking forward here to his comportment in the hour of his trial. Boldness, i.e., of speech: again he is thinking of his conduct at his impending trial.

21-26. The contrast between bodily life and death or what follows death runs through this passage. To live therefore means "to live in this present world." "The presence of Christ is the cheer of my life . . . the Spirit of Christ the life of my life, the love of Christ the power of my life, the will of Christ the law of my life, the glory of Christ the end of my life" (Eadie). To die is gain—this is very different from the world-weariness of the pagan poet who said "to die is better than to live in wretchedness." To Paul it was the life which follows death that would be gain. He is torn between conflicting emotions. He would fain continue to labor for Christ in this life, yet he longs for the closer union with Christ which death would give. What I shall choose I wot (know) not (v. 22). As Lightfoot points out, the sublime guess of Euripides, "Who knows if to live be death, and to die be life?" which was greeted with ignoble ridicule by the comic poets, has become an assured truth in Christ. To depart (v. 23) is a metaphor used of breaking camp, or weighing anchor, or the departure of guests. To be with Christ seems different from Paul's former view of death as a sleep. This new thought cannot be limited to those who suffer a martyr death. Those who had a similar relation to Christ as Paul had in life can look forward to being with Christ after death. Paul comes down finally on the side of remaining. And he is so sure that the Philippians need him still that he feels assured that God thinks so too. Joy, the characteristic note of the Epistle, is repeated here.

27-30. Exhortations to Unity in Fellowship. (See also 2¹⁻⁴.) If I am to remain in the flesh, Paul seems to say, do you make it worth my while by behaving in the right spirit. And writing out of the heart of the imperial city to a Roman colony he uses a word which would appeal to him and to them, for he says (v. 27), Behave as citizens, put in practice your duties as burgesses of the Kingdom. Their conduct is to be (1) outwardly, a fellowship in contending, (2) inwardly, a fellowship in lowly love. The metaphor in striving is apparently drawn from the combats in the Roman amphitheater. In one Spirit is a hint that there were differences among the Philippians. Paul uses "Spirit" in a religious, not a psychological sense. It is the Spirit of God which creates unity of purpose, stirs up sympathy and will to co-operate ("with one soul"). "For the faith" (cf. mg.) gives the better meaning here. "Faith" leans toward its later sense here—the body of truth which is the gospel. Not being affrighted (v. 28)—stampeded, a word used of scared horses. The adversaries were not the Judaizers. The danger from them would not be intimidation but seduction. It is the idol-worshippers of Philippi who would look menacingly on any new faith that sought to undermine their worship. Paul gives three grounds for encouragement in a brave endurance: (1) The opponents themselves have inwardly the feeling of defeat. (2) Suffering for Christ is a high honor. "Adversity is the blessing of the N.T." (see Mt. 51-10). (3) They may have the feeling of sharing a common fate with Paul. "The Christian gladiator," says Lightfoot, "does not anxiously await the signal of life or death from the fickle crowd." It is God who sets the contest, and he gives the warrior the "sure token of deliverance."

CHAPTER II

1-4. Exhortations to Unity Continued. (See also 127-30.) As Paul continues his exhortations, his words take on a more earnest tone. He heaps up his reasons for summoning his readers to unity. He gives four grounds of appeal: (1) If there be any incentive in the fact that you are in Christ, (2) if there be any tender appeal originating in your feelings of love, (3) if there be any reality in your fellowship of the Spirit, (4) if there be in you any heart of mercy and sympathy. Then Paul multiplies phrases about unity in a "tautology of earnestness" (Vaughan). Faction and vain-glory (v. 3): exaltation of party and exaltation of self are the two enemies to a real love-unity. "It is a strange phenomenon in religious history that intense earnestness so frequently breeds a spirit mingled of censoriousness and conceit" (Kennedy). Lowliness of mind is a word practically of Christian coinage. The adjective "humble" in common Greek usage meant abject, groveling. Through the influence of Christ's life and character humility was raised to its true level. Ruskin makes it "the first test of a truly great man." In v. 4 Paul is not encouraging any inquisitiveness, only a gentle regard for each other. Unselfishness is the real road to harmony.

5-11. The Example of the Incarnate Christ. Not the self-sacrifice but the self-humiliation of Christ is emphasized in this great passage. Paul has just been dealing with the Christian's practical relation to his brethren; here he is dealing with the state of mind which lies at the basis of this relation. But the section goes far beyond the particular occasion: it has a high Christological value. Do these verses speak of a pre-existent Christ or merely of the attitude of Christ when he became man? The first is the interpretation of almost all the early Christian Fathers; the second is a more modern view; but the majority of the modern expositors still hold to the first. In the second interpretation, the form of God is regarded as the divine glory or power which Jesus inwardly possessed on earth but for the most part did not display. Against this, however, stands the fact that the words He emptied himself speak not of an abeyance or concealment but of a genuine putting off. Being originally (Greek) in the form of God expresses something about the pre-existent Christ; yet the subject of the sentence, who, refers not merely to the pre-existent Christ but to the single Personality who in his pre-existence and in his earthly existence is one and the same. "Form" signifies the inward being or essence, the native constitution of the reality, irrespective of the conditions under which it may appear. The point of emphasis in the whole passage is the unspeakable contrast between the heavenly and the earthly states, between being in the form of God and taking the form of a slave. Paul is gripped and governed by the profound ethical significance of the humiliation.

Counted it not a prize [or a thing to be grasped] to be on an equality with God. This does not mean that Christ might have considered his equality with God a possession to be clung to; or that he would have retained his equality with God as a robber grasps his prey, if he had not undergone the incarnation. The "prize" is something to be seized or clutched at, i.e., it is something still in the future. We get a glimpse of what it means in the episode of the Temptation. Christ was tempted by a dazzling display of power on earth to lay claim to the divine glory which really belonged to him; tempted by using illicit worldly means to raise himself to a political Messiahship, lording it over the kingdoms of the world. That would have been making his lordship a res rapienda, a thing to be clutched at. On the contrary, he chose the long, bitter, sorrowful way of humiliation, suffering, and death. So he emptied himself, divested himself of the divine glory which he had when in the form of God, and assumed the form of a slave. To the being or essence of God there was added the being or essence of a slave. Not that he became the slave of men, but that as a man he bore the nature of a slave. Whose slave he became is not stated. Servitude belonged to the essential nature of his humanity, as the next phrase, being made in the likeness of men, indicates. This likeness was no shadowy insubstantial thing. Nor does being found in fashion as a man (v. 8) mean that his humanity was less real than his previous form of Godhead had been. The word "fashion" merely emphasizes "the transitory quality of our materiality" (Gore). Found, i.e., by men. It was as a man that men reckoned him. He humbled himself really repeats "He emptied himself" in a more ethical way. To whom Christ became obedient is not mentioned. But as a fact, his death was undertaken not in obedience to men but to God. In his earthly life he willed to surrender his own will to the Father's. He learned obedience through suffering. Unto death expresses not the duration but the highest degree of his obedience. Death seems to men unnatural. Horror of death is a human emotion. And it was intensified in the case of Christ by being the death of a cross. Not "the cross"; the atoning significance of Christ's death is absent from the context. It was the fate of a slave he suffered, the uttermost degree of shame (cf. Heb. 122), in contrast to the honor and glory which the pre-existent Christ had. Death on a cross meant for a Jew not merely loss of citizenship but being outcast from the divine community. This stands in deepest contrast to being in the form of God. He was reckoned with the transgressors. In this was completed his obedience. It was the utmost point of his humiliation, the fullest contradiction of the form of God, the absolute giving up of his own will.

The consequence was his exaltation (v. 9). This is a principle of divine action which Christ himself laid down (Lk. 14¹¹). The name above every name. God is the giver of the name. Paul considered Jesus as in some sense subordinate to the Father (cf. Jn. 14²⁸ Rom. 13. 4 1 Cor. 15²⁸). "The name" denotes office, rank, dignity, and is undoubtedly the title "Lord." "Jesus is Lord" is the shortest, simplest and most common creed in the N.T. It is a name given to God alone in the O.T. Paul is thinking, in the first place, most probably of the O.T. usage, though he is aware that it is the name given in the mystery religions to the supreme mediator of the mystery. In "the name which is above every name" he appears to compare and contrast the lordship of Jesus with that of all the lords of the mystery religions (cf. Eph. 12¹). Things in heaven, etc., is perhaps better rendered "beings in heaven," etc. Though Lightfoot says, "The personification of universal nature offering its praise and homage to its creator in Psa. 148 will serve to illustrate Paul's meaning here," we are inclined to agree with Theodoret, who says, "He calls the invisible powers beings in heaven, and men still living beings on earth, and those who are dead beings of the world below."

In v. 11 the title given to Jesus is clearly indicated. The confession that Jesus is Lord might be called the N.T. creed (cf. Acts 2³⁶ Rom. 10⁹ 1 Cor. 8⁶ 12³ Eph. 4⁵ 6²⁴ Col. 2⁶ 1 Pet. 1³ Jude v. 4). And this acknowledgment of Jesus' exaltation tends to or issues in the glory of God the Father. Christ has carried his manhood—the manhood that has redeemed humanity—into the Godhead, and as such now receives the homage of creation.

12-18. Work Out Your Salvation. So then—"having the example of Christ's humility to guide you, the example of Christ's exaltation to encourage you" (Lightfoot). The obedience here recalled is not obedience to Paul, but to God: that is brought out by with fear and trembling, i.e., with a nervous anxiety to do right before a Supreme Master (cf. Eph. 6⁵). "For there is nothing which ought to make us incline more to humility and fear than when we hear that we stand by the grace of God alone" (Calvin). It is God that works both the willing—the very original impulse to right action; and the doing—the carrying out of that will in action. God's grace is at once "preventive" and "co-operant" (cf. Eph. 2⁸). Yet they are called to work out their own salvation themselves. Free will coincides with grace in the working out of God's purpose. There is no doctrine of irrevocable election here: the divine purpose does not reduce man to a machine.

The murmurings and disputings (v. 14) are either against God, or more probably friction among the Philippians. Murmurings, as Lightfoot suggests, may be a word of moral import—smoldering discontent; and disputings of intellectual import—rebellion against God. It is obvious that Paul has an O.T. reference in mind (Deut. 32⁵). But it is more a memory-echo than a quotation, and must not be pressed as giving a clue to the meaning here. Are seen (v. 15) might be rendered "shine," and in the world is either in the human world of good and evil (Lightfoot), or in the cosmos of created things (Kennedy)—carrying out the metaphor of lights, or luminaries (Greek). Not "holding fast" but holding forth the word of life fulfills the metaphor best (cf. 1 Jn. 11-3). Paul wants to win some credit from Christ in the Philippians, hence the use of metaphors from the race course and the athletic games. In v. 17 he introduces a new metaphor. He thinks of the Philippians as the priests, their Christian achievements as their sacrifice, his own possible martyr death as the accompanying libation.

19-30. Personalia. I hope in the Lord. All Paul's activity now takes place in Christ; his emotions, thoughts, boasts are those of Christ: his very hopes, even the slightest, are a throb of the hopes of his Lord (cf. v. 24). The steadfastness and reliability of Timothy are in contrast to the way some in his own immediate circle have apparently treated Paul. In the sudden vehement expression of feeling, however, in v. 24, he may have only one man in his mind's eye. Was it Demas? (2 Tim. 4¹⁰.) Who Epaphroditus (v. 25) was is not otherwise known. Hardly Epaphras (Col. 17 4¹² Philm. v. 23), for he was a native of Colossæ, and this man is closely associated with the life of Philippi. Paul describes him finely here, as brother and fellow worker and fellow soldier. Anselm paraphrases: my brother in the faith, my co-operator in preaching, my comrade in adversity. He is further their apostle (mg.), i.e., delegate or messenger; and minister to Paul's need. Epaphroditus had been ill and homesick in Rome, unhappy because the Philippians had heard he was ill. Note that Paul does not expect to cease from sadness, but only to be less sorrowful: the sadness of his present situation remains. Hazarding (v. 30)—staking, adventuring—a metaphor from gambling; cf. the parabolant, the brotherhood who at the risk of their lives nursed the sick and buried the dead.

CHAPTER III

1-11. Against the Judaizers and Spiritual Pride. Finally may mean that Paul intended to end his letter here, but a new train of thought set him off again (see p. 1240a); or it may simply mean "in continuance." Rejoice: an exhortation from one who is himself in prison. But even in the prison he has his Lord. V. 1 suggests that Paul had already been in communication with the Philippians. Probably he had already warned them about the Judaizers (see notes on Acts 15^{1f}. Gal. 24), a warning which he is now to repeat. Some have attempted to find three different classes indicated in v. 2—Gentiles (dogs), self-seeking Christian teachers (evil workers), unbelieving Jews (the concision). But it is more natural to take these as three descriptions of the same class. "Evil workers" implies that they were within the Christian community, and since they were advocates of circumcision the Judaizers are suggested. The first word describes their character—roaming and insolent, dogs that barked and bit at Paul, a word used possibly by way of retort to what the Judaizers said of those who were without the pale of circumcision. The second phrase describes their conduct—they sought to seduce Paul's converts from the true freedom that is in Christ (Gal. 3). The third word describes their destructive creed—that circumcision was necessary for a complete Christian. By the ironic word "concision" Paul suggests that they were insisting on mere manual mutilation. It is those who render to God a spiritual obedience who are the true circumcision.

Note the contrast between in Christ Jesus and in the flesh (v. 3). The flesh is the soil where the plant of the soul's life roots and grows at first; it is the sphere in which forces of evil lay ghostly fingers on the soul and drag it down. "In Christ" means in the clear, serene region or atmosphere into which the soul springs by faith, and in which it blossoms and blooms: it is the region of freedom and power to overcome, in which the soul can exult with a victorious Christian gladness. Paul goes on to describe (1) his fleshly or hereditary privileges, as if they were a staff he possessed but did not lean on. (a) No proselyte circumcision his: a Jew from infancy. (b) His parents were not proselytes either. "Israel" expresses the spiritual nobility of the race—of the true covenant stock. (c) He was of no renegade tribe, but a tribe which remained faithful to Judah at the disruption of the kingdom (see 2 Chr. 101-1112). (d) A Hebrew of the Hebrews—different in language and manners from the Hellenists. (2) His privileges from personal choice: (a) a Pharisee—strict in observance of ritual law; (b) "as touching zeal, persecuting the church"—a phrase of deep and concentrated irony: he talks of it in the present, as if the memory of it were still shudderingly upon him; (c) omitting no legal observance however trivial: nothing that was supposed to make a man accepted with God. Cf. the Rich Young Ruler; only he failed to take the step which Paul next relates.

7-9. Gains—plural, as though he were in the habit of counting them one by one as a miser; loss—singular, as though he now threw them all together. For Christ—"the lamp is superfluous when the sun is shining" (Theodoret). The knowledge (v. 8) is the highest degree of faith, "the reflection of faith in our reason" (Beyschlag), illumination, the stage reached by the complete initiate into the Christian mystery. It is knowledge of Christ, the Anointed One, in his exalted power and glory; knowledge of Jesus, who in the days of his flesh shared our trials and sorrows and whose heart still throbs with ours; knowledge of the Lord, through whom we enter into spiritual victory over the world; and "my Lord" in contrast with all other lords or mediators of mysteries. (See art., Backgrounds, pp. 851-2, and cf. pp. 1253-5.) To know Christ is "to have the key which will unlock all the secrets of existence." Suffered loss: perhaps Paul was excommunicated from the synagogue at Tarsus when he returned there after his first visit as a Christian to Jerusalem—lost all his Jewish privileges. Win Christ—Paul speaks here as though it were something he had not yet attained. To win him is to possess him, to have him within; and to be found in him is the other side of this truth. It involves the complete identification of the believer with Christ, becoming a member of his body—a union close, tender, vital and constant. For the meaning of a righteousness of mine own, even that which is of the law (v. 9), cf. Gal. 216-21 310-12 Rom. 321-31 413, 14 930-32 104, 5. The sphere of the Law, which might be said to lie between those of the flesh and of the Spirit (in Christ), was like a house of mirrors to conscience, demanding obedience to every jot and tittle, but impotent, unable to give power to fulfill. It was the propitiation wrought out by Christ which gave one power, living in Christ, in the life of the Spirit, to fulfill the Law. The only condition required for attaining this righteousness is faith. Faith in this deed of God means union with Christ. To be righteous or to have righteousness is to make a divinely empowered response to this forgiveness of God.

10, 11. Paul goes on again to speak of knowing Christ—the apotheosis of faith; not mere intellectual recognition, but communion, appropriation; not historical insight nor theoretical information, mere acquaintanceship with facts and dates, but the highest reach of Christian experience, a living intimacy with the living Christ. The power of his resurrection is not the power which brought about his resurrection, but the power which his risen life gives to those that are in him, victory over the flesh (Rom. 7^{24f.}), the assurance of immortality (Rom. 8¹¹ 1 Cor. 15¹⁴), a quickening and stimulating of the whole moral and spiritual being. The fellowship of his sufferings may mean either the prior experience of being conformed to the death of Jesus, or fellowship with the sufferings which the exalted Christ still endures in his Body, the church. Attaining unto the resurrection from the dead means to the resurrection of the righteous into a new and glorious life.

12-16. Laying Hold on Christ. Paul here launches into a description of the deficiency of all Christian experience, but it is couched still in the first person: his gentle way of rebuking some in Philippi who were inclined to pride themselves in having attained great heights in spirituality. I have not yet attained perfect Christian experience, he says, I am not yet fully initiate. As Luther said, paradoxically, "He who is a Christian is no Christian." The verb press on expresses the intense action of a runner in the stadium. Some Greek Fathers introduce the idea that Paul was fleeing from Christ when he was apprehended. Cf. Francis Thompson's Hound of Heaven: "Fear wist not to evade as Love wist to pursue." Spiritual self-satisfaction, Paul is saying here, is a deterrent to any real advance. When he speaks of forgetting the things that are behind, he means not merely all his Jewish privileges and Jewish attainments, but also that part of the Christian race which he had already run. Paul did not repose on memories. One of the best gifts a man can have is the faculty of knowing how and what to forget. If the past is to live anywhere it is in our consciences rather than in our imaginations. Men are prone to revive amiable non-essentials for the satisfaction of pride. The man who is buried in the complacent contemplation of his past, who goes about trying to recall what he did yesterday, is apt to become narrow-minded. Spiritual growth is stopped. No room is left for the countless treasures of God's grace. Does the duty of life consist merely in honoring the memory of old ties, or does it not also include listening to the divine claim of new ones? Certain it is that when the supreme love of our life comes to us, and Jesus Christ enters the heart, there is nothing that can oppose its claim to his.

In what follows Paul is quite clearly using the metaphor of the chariot races. It is perhaps not necessary to distinguish between the goal and the prize (v. 14). They were one—the purified life which results in unbroken and complete fellowship with Christ. Perfect (v. 15) means mature or initiated. Augustine says, "perfect pilgrims, not yet perfect possessors." Chrysostom says the apostle is speaking not about dogmas, or matters of belief, but about perfection of life. Still there may be just a hint of reproachful irony here, a reference to some in Philippi who thought themselves versed in the higher mysteries of the Christian faith. As initiates, Paul says, think of yourselves rather as entrants on a race the goal of which is not yet attained. Let them utilize their experience. What has been helpful in the past will still be helpful. And Paul pleads for unity in conduct and faith. In the spirit of the metaphor of the race, they are urged to keep step with one another.

17-21. The Danger of Antinomianism or Lawlessness. (See also 4¹.) Paul feels compelled to set himself and his associates up as a standard. For if the Philippians are not to follow the Judaizers, they are not to swing away to the opposite extreme of lawlessness. By many he means professing Christians: Paul's tears would have little meaning otherwise. Enemies of the cross would have been a mere platitude had he meant heathen. The cross of Christ is the complete contradiction of all that the natural man esteems highly (cf. Rom. 16¹⁸). The true Christian is crucified with Christ. (See Gal. 2²⁰.) Paul attacks here (v. 19) the self-indulgence which wounds the tender conscience of others and turns liberty into license. These lawless ones make a boast of what is really a shame and a disgrace to them. And Paul urges that our citizenship, or rather commonwealth, "is in heaven" (see note on 127). "We are a colony of heaven" (Moffatt). Just as the Roman colonists might expect a protector in the Roman magistrate or emperor (to whom the term "Saviour" was sometimes applied), so "our" Deliverer is to come from the divine commonwealth—heaven. Paul still kept his expectation of the Lord's return. In what he says about the body (not "vile" as in A.V.), Paul is not endorsing the Platonic and Stoic suggestion of the body as a clog to the soul. Contempt for the body is not Christian teaching. The body is to be changed—fashioned anew—not destroyed. The connection of thought here is this. The Antinomians reckoned the soul's bliss as the only thing that counted. The body with all its passions could be abused or indulged, for it was to pass away into the oblivion of death, Paul therefore has to remind his readers that some sort of body persists after death, and though it is not the body we bury in the grave, it is in some way related to it. For Paul's doctrine of the heavenly body, cf. 2 Cor. 5:1-5 1 Cor. 15:35-58. It is Christ, the life-giving Spirit, who effects this transformation. And the body which he now inhabits as a Spirit in glory is the standard according to which our spiritual bodies will be fashioned; and he is to do it by virtue of the fact that there belongs to him the power to subdue all things to himself.

CHAPTER IV

1. Exhortation to Steadfastness. After all this warning (3:17-21) the apostle's love finds expression for itself in an accumulation and repetition of words of endearment. His crown is his garland of victory and joy, something of achievement he will be able to show Christ at the last day. He counsels them to maintain their ground within the sphere of Christ's living Spirit.

2-7. Exhortations to Christian Virtues. The disunion in Philippi, which Paul has been hinting at in the course of the letter, comes out into the open here. He repeats the word I exhort with each name to show that he is not blaming one side more than the other. The women may have been deaconesses, each with her own little coterie of followers. They are to be of one mind; in the sphere of the life of the risen Christ there is no room for dissension. For the yokefellow see p. 1238b. Their laboring with Paul in the gospel indicates that these two women occupied a high and honorable position in the Philippian church. Probably they belonged to the band of women with whom Paul had conversed by the river bank when he came to Philippi (Acts 16:11-12), and who had thenceforward taken an active part in bringing others to hear Paul preaching. Clement was evidently a prominent Christian in Philippi (see intro.). As for the rest, their names are in the book of life. The book of life was originally an O.T. expression for the register of the covenant people. To be blotted from that book was to forfeit the privileges of the theocracy. But it came to refer to immortality (Dan. 12:1 Psa. 69:28). In Revelation it is constantly so used. There are many members of the Christian Church whose names count for little in the eyes of men, but who nevertheless are all remembered before God. The figure suggests the minuteness and infallibility of the divine knowledge.

The dominant mood of the Epistle—rejoice—recurs with v. 4. It seems to resume 3:1. Paul repeats the word, as Herbert says, "to take away the scruples of those that might say, 'What, shall we rejoice in afflictions?' " "The 'new people' are always happy, always in the full bloom of thought, always at springtime" (Clement of Alexandria). Forbearance means readiness to be reasoned with. It implies gentleness, the opposite of a spirit of contention and self-seeking; a quality needed in Philippi. Forbearance produces an undisturbed heart, the true atmosphere in which one can rejoice. The Lord is at hand was evidently a kind of password (Maran atha) among Christians of the early church. The Lord who is to be the final Judge of all actions is coming soon. Have done with censoriousness. Let him do the judging.

The following sermon divisions of v. 6 are familiar: (1) careful for nothing (i.e., not careless but carefree); (2) prayerful for everything; (3) thankful for anything. Thanksgiving, a rare word in secular Greek, is used twelve times by Paul. Thanksgivings are the wings of prayer. The peace of God is a rich phrase: not the peace in a man's soul which has God for its object, but the peace in God's soul (subjective genitive) which he bequeaths to man (genitive of origin) in the reconciliation wrought out by Christ. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you," said Jesus. Such a legacy of peace is found through reconciliation. It is the carefree man that can share God's peace. This is a peace which transcends all power of conception (Eph. 3:19, 20). Guard (v. 7) is suggestive. Paul thinks of Christ as a citadel; the peace of God as its bulwarks, or sentinel at the gate; and the heart as a regiment of thoughts and purposes—the inhabitants of the citadel. It is union with Christ which secures this peace.

8, 9. Things to Think On. Paul specifies at length the kind of thoughts his readers ought to make the subject of meditation. They are not specifically Christian virtues: they belong to pagan morality also. True—truth exists apart from the gospel: the gospel sheds light on its nature and obligation. Honorable—having "a noble seriousness" (Matthew Arnold). Just or righteous. This word with "true" forms the foundation of all morality. Pure—untainted, free from all debasing elements. Lovely—things whose grace attracts, having "the grace of graciousness" (Walter Pater). This is one of the terms of moral approbation. The other is of good report—high-toned. Virtue sums up the first four qualities named: a word of Greek ethics used by Paul only here. Beza says, "It is too lowly a word if compared with the gifts of the Holy Spirit." Christian virtues have a special fragrance of their own; and here doubtless Paul would signify "all that becomes a man redeemed by the blood of Christ and tenanted by the Holy Spirit." Praise sums up the last two qualities named. Erasmus says, "Praise is the companion of virtue." These then are the kind of thoughts the Philip-pians are to harbor if the peace of God is to be their guardian.

From considering their proper line of meditation Paul turns to consider their true line of action (v. 9). "Meditation precedes, then work follows" (Calvin). They are to obey his precepts and to imitate his example. The first two verbs refer to his conduct as an instructor, the last two to his private demeanor.

10-20. Paul Returns Thanks for the Gift. Paul has now practically closed his letter. "The God of peace shall be with you" sounds like a farewell. The But at the beginning of v. 10 "arrests a subject which is in danger of escaping" (Lightfoot). Paul's thanks—one of the motives for his letter—are reserved almost for a postscript. There is noticeable a certain hesitancy to speak of his indebtedness. The sensitiveness of his language, which he veils in financial terms used in a semi-playful way (see below), reflects his resentment at the slander—that he was a mountebank living off the gospel—which had been leveled at him in Thessalonica and Corinth (cf. 1 Thess. 29 2 Cor. 10). There is a metaphor in the word for "revived" (v. 10). It means "put forth new shoots." The Philip-pians had flourished green again, not in their care for the apostle, which had never withered, but either in their own temporal circumstances or in opportunities. He adds, however, "My gratitude is not a beggar's thanks for charity" (Beet). He is content (v. 11). This is a frequent word in Stoic philosophy, but whereas Paul's self-sufficiency was due to his faith, that of the Stoics was due to their pride. I have learned the secret (v. 12) means "I am initiated. I possess the mystery." Initiation into the mystery cults was a slow and laborious process. Not without toil and pains had Paul reached this stage of perfection. Perhaps he also suggests that the final result was a divine revelation to him.

In v. 13 the apostle rises from knowledge to power: Knowledge is power. Then he praises them. Ye did well is like an echo of the Master's "Well done." Their sympathy with the apostle in prison is the very trait which the Judge selects for eulogy at the last. It was no new thing on their part, this sympathy. The beginning or introduction of the gospel is when the gospel was first preached to them. In the matter of giving and receiving (v. 15) is a figure borrowed from pecuniary transactions. Paul had bestowed on them priceless spiritual gifts: it was only right that he should receive material blessings from them. Still he is anxious to remind them that he allowed no other church to have such dealings. And he is anxious to impress on them that it was not the gift but the giving which gave him joy. I have (v. 18) is the regular expression found on the papyri to indicate the receipt of what is due. "He indicates that the transaction is a debt" (Chrysostom). Their giving had, however, overflowed the account. For an odor of a sweet smell cf. Gen. 821 Ex. 2918 Ezek. 2041. Paul reveals here again his fondness for the metaphor of sacrifice (cf. 217 Rom. 121 1516).

The my in v. 19 is emphatic. "The apostle uses the simple future as if he pledged himself for God" (Eadie). He is assured of this because of the riches which are in the glory—the manifested divine character—which is yours through your union with Christ. Then he breaks into doxology. "Doxology flows from the joy of the whole epistle" (Bengel). To God, who is for the Christian community Father, in that he has set them in the sphere of his life, belongs the praise which magnifies him in the æons of æons. A German hymn says, "We need Eternities since times are too short to offer thanks to him."

21-23. Final Salutations and Benediction. The phrase every saint suggests that the greeting is to be conveyed to each member individually. This paragraph may have been written, according to Paul's custom, in his own hand. Paul's own immediate circle join in the salutations, then all the Roman Christians, especially the slaves and freedmen who had become Christians in the imperial residence. It used to be assumed that this phrase, they that are of Cæsar's household, designated persons of high rank, and extreme critics used it to attack the genuineness of the letter, thinking that it referred to Clemens and Domitilla, relatives of the Emperor Domitian, who suffered for the faith at the close of the century. But of this there is no shadow of proof. The closing benediction is almost certainly an autograph.

COLOSSIANS

BY PROFESSOR C. H. DODD

INTRODUCTION

The Divisions of the Epistle: Theological and Ethical. The Epistle falls (if we exclude the formal epistolary address and the personal matter at the close) into two main sections, like Romans, Galatians and Ephesians—one chiefly theological (13–34) and one chiefly practical and ethical (35–46). The division, however, is not so clear-cut as in these other Epistles. The theological section has two principal passages, the one (112–23) growing imperceptibly out of the thanksgiving and prayer with which the letter begins, and containing a condensed statement of a doctrine of the person of Christ, with its verification in Christian experience; the other (28–19) consisting of a polemic against certain false presentations of Christianity, both theological and ethical, and leading up to a restatement of the fundamental Christian experience (220–34). These two passages are connected by a passage in which the writer makes a personal appeal to his readers (124–27). The transition from theology to ethics is already made in the passage (220–34) describing the Christian experience of “dying” and “rising again” with Christ, and this is made the basis for the practical precepts which follow in the latter main section of the Epistle, which is, in fact, a very concise survey of Christian ethics in principle and practice, with some examples (35–46).

Purpose of the Epistle. The primary purpose of the Epistle is clearly indicated by the polemical passages, particularly 28–23. The Colossian church had been troubled by teaching of a type which Paul considered dangerous to the faith. It claimed to represent a “Higher Thought” (28, 18), offered initiations (218), enjoined the observance of holy days such as the Jewish Sabbath and New Moon (216), and of ascetic practices (216, 21), and set forth as objects of worship beings variously described as “Elements of the Universe,” and “Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Powers,” in such a way that Christ ceased to be the Supreme Head of the religious society. It is not difficult to recognize by these signs a type of religious thought widespread in the world into which Christianity came. It is a type of thought to which the term “Gnosticism” is in a general sense applied. Gnosticism has been regarded as a Christian “heresy or group of heresies.” Really the Christian “heresies” comprised under that name were only aspects of a much wider movement of thought. It arose from a mixture, or syncretism, of Greek and Oriental religions, supported by a kind of philosophy or pseudo-philosophy borrowing largely from Platonism and Stoicism. Like modern Theosophy, which sometimes claims, not without justice, to be the lineal successor of Gnosticism, it often sought to interpret the meaning of all religions within a highly speculative theory of the universe. Beings corresponding to the gods of polytheism were ranged in a hierarchy of spiritual essences—or “discarnate intelligences” (to borrow an apt phrase of Thomas Hardy)—mediating between the Absolute and the world of men. Under the auspices of this imposing “philosophy” the practice of religion was built up from materials derived from all manner of sources—Oriental, Jewish, Anatolian, Egyptian, Greek, and even farther afield. There were mysteries and initiations, and a great variety of ceremonial and ascetic practices. In a world where the older paganism had largely lost its hold on thinking men, Gnosticism seemed to offer something like a universal religion resting on a philosophical basis, and capable of endless adaptation. (See further, art., Backgrounds, pp. 847–52.)

It is apparent that “Gnostic” thought at Colossæ had a strongly Jewish tinge, and it was ready to “adopt” Christianity, and to find a place for Christ within its hierarchy of spiritual beings. Paul saw that this would mean that what was distinctive in Christianity would be swamped in a vague and unprofitable syncretism, while in the ritual and ascetic practices recommended he saw a relapse into a position indistinguishable in principle from the Jewish legalism against which he had fought.

Paul’s Reply to the Challenge of Gnosticism. His method of dealing with the problem thus presented is to develop a new and more adequate statement of the position and dignity which Christian experience necessarily assigns to Christ. (For the details of his new Christology, see notes on the relevant passages of the Epistle.) The outcome of it is to set forth the person and work of Christ as having a cosmic significance. If Christ, known as Saviour, were but one among a host of unknowable Powers, the Christian would still be a stranger in a universe which might at last prove to be hostile. If, however, what we find in Christ is the ultimate Meaning of the universe, then the salvation he brings is absolute and final. This is the faith that Paul seeks to safeguard by identifying Christ with that divine Wisdom by which the world and all powers controlling it were brought into being, and through which at last God will fulfill his purpose in it all.

It is thus that Paul takes up the challenge of the "new thought," by placing his teaching about salvation in Christ upon a more philosophical basis. But in doing so he reasserts with remarkable force and clarity what had always been the core and center of his gospel: Christ died to reconcile men—to reconcile all beings—to the will and purpose of God. Through faith in him we become reconciled by sharing mystically in his death and resurrection. Nowhere else in the Pauline writings is the whole of the Christian life more clearly exhibited as the working out of what it means to die and rise again with Christ. In particular, it is made plain past all possibility of misunderstanding that this dying and rising again is an actual moral experience, manifesting itself in character and conduct. Gnostic speculation was morally barren. As Paul saw, its asceticism was a mere playing at morality. The Christian way is above all radically ethical, and the "emancipation" it brings is the one sure beginning of a free, progressive, and positive morality for men individually and in society. Thus the careful outline of Christian ethics is no less relevant to the main purpose of the Epistle than the Christology.

Relation to Ephesians and Philemon, and the Question of Authorship. See introduction to Ephesians, pp. 1223-4.

Destination of the Epistle. The Epistle is addressed to the Christians of Colossæ, an ancient but declining Phrygian city, situated with Laodicea and Hierapolis (cf. Col. 4¹³) in the Lycus Valley, in the Roman Province of Asia. Though Paul had not himself visited the city, the introduction of Christianity there was no doubt one of the indirect fruits of his residence in that province (Acts 19¹⁰). The time of writing was one at which Paul was in prison—probably the Roman imprisonment recorded at the end of Acts.

Literature: Lightfoot, Colossians and Philemon; Maclaren, Colossians and Philemon (Expositor's Bible); Peake, Colossians (Expositor's Greek Testament); Abbott, Ephesians and Colossians (International Critical Commemtary); Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions; C. Anderson Scott, Christianity According to St. Paul.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Epistolary Introduction. This follows Paul's customary form, a slight individual modification of the epistolary convention of the period. He associates Timothy with himself as joint author, though it does not appear that Timothy's authorship was more than nominal.

3-8. Thanksgiving. Paraphrase: "I thank God for your Christian life of faith and love, based on the hope which is the content of the gospel as it is known to you—and not only known to you, but known everywhere, as a growing and fructifying principle. You learned it from my loyal comrade Epaphras, to whom I owe my news of you."

For thanksgiving and prayer at the opening of an epistle, see Eph. 13-14, note.

4, 5. The triad of faith, love and hope—the three permanent things, according to 1 Cor. 13¹³—is for Paul the least inadequate brief summary of what the Christian life is (cf. also 1 Thess. 12, 3). Elsewhere the combination of faith and love ("faith working [operating] through love," Gal. 5⁶) suffices; so here faith and love form a pair within the triad. Faith describes the Christian life on its religious side, love on its ethical side, and these two sides can no more be separated than the two sides of a coin. The life of faith and love is represented as being based on hope; hope being here not so much the act of hoping as the object hoped for. The quality of a life depends on the idea of its goal, because by this idea the dominant force of desire (the "libido" of the psychologists) is directed. Thus the idea of a divine purpose for human life revealed in Christ gives a fresh orientation to personality. Its life is then marked by faith and love. This divine purpose for human life is the "hope" which Paul describes as the content of the gospel.

6. The readers are now reminded that this gospel of hope is a universal gospel—all the world. There were in the first century, as to-day, many little local esoteric sects, with "fancy religions" of their own. If the "heretics" had their way, the Colossian church might well become such an eccentric local cult. But Christianity, as Paul conceived it, is a faith that lives in the open, making a universal appeal, and ready to prove itself in contact with the varying conditions and outlook of men in all parts of the world. In a word, it is a catholic, or world-wide religion.

To say that in the sixties of the first century it had actually been preached in all the world is something of an exaggeration. But in principle it appealed to the whole world, and in actual fact the geographical area it had already covered is astonishing. Moreover, as Paul goes on to observe, it had proved effective as a working faith in the most diverse parts of the world—it was bearing fruit and increasing (cf. Mk. 48-20) everywhere, just as it did at Colossæ.

9-14. Intercession, Passing into a Statement of the Facts of Salvation. Paraphrase: "I pray that you may clearly discern the will of God, and be wise, so that you may lead a life worthy of Christ and pleasing to God—a life of moral fruitfulness, of strength to endure, and of joyful thankfulness for God's gift of salvation. For he has saved us; we are no longer dominated by the Dark Powers, but we are under the rule of God's Son, and are therefore emancipated from sin."

The Colossians were great devotees of what they called wisdom—meaning thereby pretentious speculations. Paul prays that they may have that kind of wisdom which will enable them to live a morally sound life after Christ's pattern. The sarcasms of 1 Cor. 1, 2 are sufficient to show how Paul judged the empty rhetorical "philosophy" which was too popular then and in the following centuries. Rom. 12² Phil. 19, 10, and other passages show how fully he assumed that the conscience of ordinary lay Christians was competent to form true judgments of the will of God. That was what it meant to be guided by the Spirit; hence he prays here for spiritual understanding. In what follows, put a stop at . . . knowledge of God; another at . . . longsuffering; and a third at . . . light (vv. 10-12). We then have in three finely balanced rhythmical clauses three characteristics of the morally sound life of a Christian, namely, (a) ethically effective action; (b) growing power to endure; and, (c) underlying both, a spirit of joyful thankfulness to God. The theme of thankfulness deserves all the emphasis that Paul puts on it here and everywhere in his Epistles; and the connection here suggested between thankfulness and moral strength, both active and passive, is actually of the closest. Be sorry for yourself, and your strength to do and endure is sapped (that is good psychology, because it is plain experience); feel joy in what life brings you, and inhibitions are removed. That is something never understood by Stoics and by a certain type of Puritan. Paul's gospel was in a certain real sense "salvation by joy." But it was joy of a particular kind, founded on nothing less secure than what God has willed and done.

12, 13. We have here an important definition of what Christian salvation means. First, we observe the fundamental fact that however the blessings which make up the "saved" state be described, it is by God's act alone that we are capable of them. For made us meet read made us capable; the same word as in 2 Cor. 3⁵, 6—"who also made us sufficient as ministers," i.e., made us capable of acting as ministers. This "sole causality of God in matters of salvation" is central to Paul's whole conception of religion.

Next we observe that salvation itself is conceived under the aspect of a transition—translated us—from a realm of darkness to a realm of light. In Jewish thought of this time (in which Paul was brought up) a sharp distinction was made between "This Age" and "The Age to Come." Long experience of the evils of oppression, injustice, and every kind of misery and corruption had convinced Jewish thinkers that the present age was under the sway of the powers of darkness, and could never offer to men a life worthy of the name. That God rules they did not doubt, but all the benefits of his rule they postponed to the future. Then at last all evil would be done away, and all the promises of their religion would be fulfilled for the "holy" people of God. As the present age is the age of darkness, so the age to come will be the age of light. In God's eternal purpose his "holy ones" (saints, but that word has misleading implications for us) have an inheritance (read lot) in the light—when it comes. In the apocryphal 2 Esdras (which throws much light on Paul's pre-Christian outlook; see p. 199b), there is a gloomy presentation of the doctrine of the two ages, with the doctrine of predestination that accompanied it. "Esdras" finds it difficult to see how any man at all, or at best more than a mere handful, can possibly inherit the age to come, under the stringent conditions laid down in the Law. The same distressing problem was evidently present to the mind of Paul the Jew. But now he has found a sufficient answer to his questionings. What the Law could not do, God has done (cf. Rom. 8³)—he has made us capable of sharing the lot of the holy in light.

But, further, for Jewish thinkers the age of light was wholly future. It is Paul's constant postulate (ever since he "saw the Lord," and knew that life was triumphant over death and sin) that the "age to come" has come. What was future has begun to be present. The two ages, so to speak, overlap. While the world apart from Christ is still under the sway of the powers of darkness, for those who are "in Christ" the new age is already here

(cf. Gal. 11-5, note). The night is past and dawn has come. (See pp. 206-7.)

14. What has happened may further be described as an "emancipation" (for this is the effective sense of redemption). This is a great Pauline word. The crucial instance of a divinely wrought emancipation in history was the escape of the Hebrew clans from Egyptian servitude—the "redemption of Israel." By act of God the serfs were freed and became a people. So once again by act of God a free people had come into existence—the Christian Church, which is "the Israel of God" (Gal. 616). That there may be no mistake about the kind of "emancipation" of which he is speaking, Paul adds the further definition—the forgiveness of our sins. The enslaving power was moral evil, fixing the chains of guilt about the conscience—chains now broken (cf. Rom. 615-23).

15-20. The Cosmical Significance of Christ. For Paul, the finality and absoluteness of this salvation correspond to the absoluteness and finality of the Saviour. Paraphrase: "Christ is the divine Agent both of the original creation of the universe and of its ultimate unification under the rule of God. In the former aspect, he is the 'image' of God (spoken of in Gen. 127); he is prior in time and therefore in dignity to all created beings; by his energy not only the visible world, but its unseen rulers were brought into being; and as he existed before the universe so he maintains it in being. In the latter aspect, the totality of Godhead resides in him, so as (through his sacrificial death) to reconcile all warring elements in the universe, including the warring powers of the unseen world."

Here Paul comes to grips with the matter which primarily moved him to write this letter (see p. 1250). It is not without significance that he has approached it by way of the consideration of salvation as a glorious experience. We observe here the practical religious interest which his speculative theology serves. The important question is, whether the Christian can be sure that the Christ in whom he believes can do, and has done, all that needs to be done for his final salvation, so that nothing in the world or out of it can ever alter the fact. To be a saved man you must be able to be sure of that; for if you are still worrying about possible factors outside yourself which conceivably might interfere with your salvation, then it is no salvation at all. It is therefore not the theoretical finality of Christianity as a religious system that is at stake, but the practical finality of Christian salvation as a personal experience.

It is therefore a practical religious interest to know what is the relation in which Christ stands to God and to the whole order of reality within which our present and future existence lies. In vv. 15-18 Paul gives the answer, in effect, that this relation is that which Jewish theology attributed to Wisdom. Behind the present passage lies a piece of Scripture exegesis by rabbinic methods (which Paul had doubtless learned from Gamaliel in early days). What is said of Wisdom in Proverbs and in the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon (a comparatively new book when Paul was a young student and evidently one that he had eagerly read) is combined with the creation story in Gen. 1. "The Lord possessed me in the beginning [or, as the beginning] of his ways, before all his works." So speaks Wisdom in Prov. 822. Wisdom, therefore, is the "beginning" spoken of in Gen. 11. But the same Hebrew word (which etymologically suggests the meaning "head") can also be rendered "chief," as a close cognate is actually rendered in Prov. 47, "Wisdom is the principal thing." Further, the word used for "beginning" in Genesis and Proverbs, in the Greek translation can mean not only that which is temporarily prior, but that which is logically prior, or the "first principle"; and, in fact, the first two words of Genesis were understood by some ancient commentators to mean not "in the beginning" (i.e., before anything else happened), but "by means of a first principle," which first principle was then identified with Wisdom on the basis of Psa. 10424, "in (or by) wisdom hast thou made them all." Once more, the Wisdom of Solomon in a noble passage (722f.) describes Wisdom as "an image of his goodness." It was therefore not difficult to find Wisdom in that passage of Genesis which declares that man was made in the "image" of God. Thus the theological vocabulary of the present passage—image, firstborn, in him were all things created, before all, head, pre-eminence—can all be found in the context of these speculations about the divine Wisdom. All these terms, applied by Jewish thinkers to Wisdom, are here applied to Christ, whom Paul had years before declared to be "the Power of God and the Wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 124; cf. notes on Jn. 11-18).

15. Christ is the image of the invisible God—like Wisdom. But Paul knew him to be such because he had seen "the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor. 46). It is a religious postulate of the Bible, from Moses to Paul and John, that man cannot "see God"—that God in his essence is not an object of human experience. Always our knowledge of God is mediated through something belonging to our own experience. For Paul it was mediated by his experience of a divine-human Person. If we would be true to the central thought of Christianity, we must always find the form of our experience of God in Christ, his image.

The word firstborn most naturally implies priority in time; but so closely was primogeniture associated with superior dignity that it is often used simply in the sense of "chief" (and as such is actually used sometimes to translate the same Hebrew word used in Gen. 1¹ for "beginning"). Possibly, therefore, Paul means simply "the chief of creation"; but as he uses just below the phrase "firstborn from the dead" (v. 18) in the sense of one who rose from the dead before anyone else, i.e., in the sense of temporal priority (cf. Rom. 8²⁹ 1 Cor. 15^{20, 23}), it is probable that temporal priority is implied here also. But in that case the meaning cannot be "the One created before all other created things," for this is ruled out by the context. The meaning must be "One who was in being before the creation" (like Wisdom in Prov. 8²²).

16a. To Christ, as Wisdom, the visible and invisible worlds owe their being; and Paul adds, to be explicit, that this includes all orders of discarnate intelligences (see p. 1250b). The Colossian "heretics" were setting them in a position of rivalry to Christ. But if it be true that Christ stands to God and the world in the relation of creative Wisdom, then the Powers which control parts of the universe must owe their being to him and, therefore, as derivative beings, must be subordinate to him. The names Thrones, Dominations, Princedoms, Powers (as Milton renders them) are borrowed from the angelology of Jewish apocalyptic.

16b, 17. All orders of being, then, were created "in" Christ (v. 16a). The choice of the preposition is probably dictated by the phrase of Genesis "in the Beginning," which Paul took to mean "in Wisdom" and therefore "in Christ." It is not, however, in itself a very perspicuous phrase, and so Paul proceeds to say in unambiguous language just what he conceives the relation of Christ to creation to be. First, it was through him that the universe came into being; i.e., the divine energies which brought the universe into existence were exercised by Christ. Secondly, the universe was created unto him, i.e., he was not only its "instrumental" but its "final" cause; the purpose of its being is inherent in him. Thus, not only is he prior to the world, and so transcendent, but he is also immanent in it, and by his energies all is maintained in being. On the theological and philosophical significance of this see the introduction.

18. There is here a transition in thought, from the significance of Christ in creation to his significance in relation to the destiny of the universe. We must recall that although Paul held that the universe has fundamentally the character of a divine creation "in Christ," yet he recognized that in the present phase of things powers alien from Christ bear wide sway—as is, indeed, undeniable for any honest thinker. Yet it must be that the titles which belong to Wisdom, and therefore to Christ—"Head," "Chief"—must ultimately have their full meaning in relation to the whole of reality. On this he has the following things to say. Here and now there is a body to which Christ is really in the fullest sense head, namely, the church. (Recall what was said above on v. 13.) The church lives already in the "Age to Come," under the kingdom of Christ, within the sphere of the direct and unimpeded exercise of divine power. Of this new age Christ was most truly the beginning, in that he was the first who ever passed from death to life. It is important to bear in mind that Paul, like Jewish thinkers in general, did not believe in the natural "immortality of the soul," in the Greek (Platonic) sense which colors our own thought. For him a dead man was really dead and done for unless and until it should please God to raise him from the dead. Thus for Paul all the great and good of ancient time "were not" (for the shadowy half-existence of Sheol did not count) until the "Age to Come" should bring the resurrection. Jesus, and Jesus alone, had already risen from the dead, and thereby initiated the new age, in which, "each in his own order" (1 Cor. 15²³), the holy dead should rise. As the new age advanced, his present primacy in the church would become a universal primacy (cf. 1 Cor. 15²³⁻²⁷ Phil. 2⁹⁻¹¹).

19. This verse contains the first of the theological terms in this passage which has not a scriptural (O.T.) basis—the Fullness. Its meaning here obviously cannot be essentially different from "the Fullness of the Godhead" in 29. The term so translated (Greek pleroma) originally meant the "full content" of a vessel or the like (e.g., the "full strength" of a military unit or a ship's crew), or the "totality" of a series (e.g., the "sum total" of monetary items). It had a considerable variety of usage, but what concerns us here is the fact that it was used by both Christian and non-Christian Gnostics as a technical term for the totality of "powers," "emanations," "æons," or whatever term was used for superhuman orders of beings supposed to intervene between man and the Absolute. Paul takes over from the Colossian "heretics" their quasi-philosophical term—not precisely in the same sense, since his philosophy was not theirs, but in a sense which they would readily understand. For him it means the sum of the divine attributes and powers not as distributed through a hierarchy of spiritual beings, but as concentrated in the One God. Gnostics too could speak of the “pleroma of good” as “God” (so Corpus Hermeticum, vi, 4; ix, 7), but in a sort of pantheistic sense, whereas Paul thought of God in personal, not pantheistic terms. Thus for him “the Totality” (the Fullness) or “the Totality of Godhead” would mean God himself regarded in his attributes rather than in his personal identity. We should probably take “the Totality,” so interpreted, as the subject of the sentence, which might then be rendered in him the Totality chose to make its dwelling. “The Totality” (=God) is, then, also the subject of the following verbs. It is he, acting in and through Christ, who will finally bring the entire universe into the unity of his own rule (cf. Job 252).

20. The question has been much discussed, what are the parties to this reconciliation or “peace-making”? The view that the parties are men on the one hand and the heavenly beings on the other seems to be excluded by the very form of words (whether . . . or). We have a reconciliation either between men and God, and between the heavenly beings and God; or else a reconciliation among men and among the heavenly beings. The simplest would seem to be a reconciliation of men and heavenly beings respectively to God (cf. Rom. 510 2 Cor. 518, 19, where the “world” at least does not exclude beings other than men). On the other hand, the grammatical construction here is not quite the same as in the passages cited, and may perhaps suggest that created beings are reconciled among themselves and, in being reconciled, brought into subjection to God (or Christ—for it is not quite clear, nor does it make much difference, whether we are to read to him, i.e., to Christ, or to himself, i.e., to God). In the thought of the time, both Jewish and non-Jewish, there was a strange longing for an assurance that the warring powers of the universe (whose conflicts, it was thought, embroiled men) would ultimately be harmonized (see p. 1250b); and as the thought-atmosphere in which Paul’s controversy with the Colossian “heretics” moves is very closely in touch with ideas of this sort, it seems on the whole best to regard him as meaning that through Christ God has chosen to put an end to all the distressing disharmonies within his universe, and bring all under one effective rule. This certainly gives the best sense to the words having made peace, and it is the teaching of Ephesians.

The reconciliation is effected by means of the blood of his cross. No hint is given here of the way in which this is to be understood. The meaning is certainly not that the shedding of Christ’s blood propitiates God. Such a thought would be wholly foreign to the context. It is probable that any reference to blood in such a thinker as Paul would suggest a reference to sacrifice in a general way. But the idea of sacrifice itself has a very wide range. Underlying it all is the quasi-mystical identification of blood with life (see Gen. 94). The very fact that Paul has here in view chiefly the discarnate intelligences shows that the blood of his cross can only be regarded as the symbol, or projection upon the material sphere, of something in its essence spiritual and so applicable to spiritual beings. We are in a realm of ideas which defy exact analysis; but the august conception moves in the background, that the utter consecration of the life of Christ in self-sacrifice has about it something so absolute and final that it establishes once and for all a supremacy of good in the presence of which all evil is powerless.

21-23. The Verification in Christian Experience. Paraphrase: “What I have said of the universe in general applies to you; for you were alienated, and God has reconciled you through the death of Christ, so as to give you an unimpeachable standing in his presence. In saying so, I assume that you are maintaining your faith, and not moving away from the hope which the gospel brought you when you heard it. Remember, it is a world-wide gospel.”

The above exposition has appeared rather speculative. Paul now appeals to the evangelical experience which for him is always the real foundation of theology. At bottom, his belief in the cosmical significance of Christ is grounded on an inward sense of the absoluteness and finality of Christ’s work in saving the Christian people—in saving Paul himself and the people he knew. The reconciliation of which they are conscious is primarily a reconciliation to God. They had been alienated from God: their mental attitude to him was a hostile one, for their deeds were evil. Now they are reconciled to him by his own act. (This is Paul’s constant teaching—not that God, having been hostile to men, was reconciled to them, as he is sometimes misrepresented.) It was, as they know, through the death of Christ that this was done; and so the reconciliation, like the death, was the work of a concrete personality, incarnate among men (the body of his flesh—probably in contradistinction to any “discarnate intelligences” that might be supposed to have a part in the work of salvation).—Once again Paul does not explain how the death of Christ reconciled. Behind the single clause lies a whole process of thought common to him and his readers, which could be assumed without argument.

Another aspect, rather than merely a consequence, of the reconciliation is the good standing before God which the reconciled enjoy. It is probably wrong to take the words to present you holy, etc. (v. 22) as referring to the ultimate issue of the divine purpose, in the final moral perfection of Christ's people. It is "justification by faith" of which Paul is speaking. It is not that the Colossians have attained, or are to attain in some remote future, a moral perfection which will secure their acceptance at the Last Judgment. It is that here and now, by grace of God, who "justifieth the ungodly," they stand before him as his consecrated people, to whom he "imputes" no fault. How they must make good this justified status by practical moral effort, Paul sets forth in the latter part of the Epistle. Here it is the divine act of grace that is in view.

23. If so be . . . If the preceding clause had been taken to refer to the ultimate moral perfection of Christians, then this sentence would naturally have been referred to the future perseverance of the Colossians, as a condition of their ultimate acceptance in the Judgment. But the actual grammatical form of the clause as well as the context is strongly against any such interpretation. The idea is that faith is that which keeps us in such a condition that at any moment it may be said that God presents us holy and without blemish (blameless) before him, i.e., that we are justified by grace. Thus what Paul has just said about the Colossians being reconciled and so justified is true on the assumption that at this present moment they are maintaining their faith. This is exactly what in strict grammar the clause would naturally imply, and it suits the context. The qualification is pointed by the fear Paul felt that by listening to the "heretics" the Colossians might actually be moving away from the Christian hope in its full scope.—In the close of the verse the Colossians are again reminded of the catholicity of the gospel, as in 1⁶, and for a similar reason.

24-29. Paul as Missionary to the Gentiles. Paraphrase: "I am suffering on your account, and I am glad of it because it is helping the church, which is Christ's body, to make up the tale of sufferings which must befall it in communion with him. I am a servant of the church by God's commission, my task being to bring into full effect the fiat of God. It was long a secret; but now he has chosen to make known to his own the full wealth of that secret as it affects the Gentiles. The secret is this: CHRIST IN YOU THE HOPE OF GLORY. I want every man to know that secret, so that every man may be a full initiate into Christ. I labor for that end with all the energy God gives me."

The controlling idea here is that of the mystical union of Christians with and in their Lord. This union is thought of by Paul as the closest possible, both for the individual (as in Gal. 2²⁰) and for the church, which is the body of Christ, as the organism through which his Spirit lives and works in the world. The sufferings of Christ are not the sufferings endured by Jesus on earth (as though these were not sufficient for the redemption of the world, and must be supplemented), but all the sufferings which the Church of Christ must endure before the consummation (of which the historic Passion of Jesus was, so to speak, the focal point). These sufferings are sufferings of Christ because Christ is the true Subject of every experience of the church in fulfilling the will of God. According to that will there is a tale of sufferings yet to be made up. Paul is glad that so much of it falls to his lot. In bearing it he is most directly serving the church.

26, 27. The age was one of "mystery-Religions," i.e., cults in which ineffable secrets were imparted to the initiated in carefully guarded ritual forms (see art., Backgrounds, pp. 851-2). The "heretics" of Colossæ, like the Gnostics in general, doubtless felt the influence of this type of religion. Well, Paul has a mystery into which he initiates men (cf. 1 Cor. 2⁶⁻¹⁶). There is a divine secret which for ages no man guessed. Much of the counsel of God was made known to the Jews, but behind that old dispensation lay a fuller purpose of God, undreamed of by generations of faithful Jews, embracing the Gentiles also. Now, it has pleased God to make known this secret, and Paul has been intrusted with its revelation. It may be summed up in the words, Christ in you the hope of glory. There are three main elements. First, there is the whole glorious content of the Christian hope (which is the principal purport of the "mystery" in 1 Cor. 2). This is, indeed, something which in one sense is inconceivable to the human mind; yet for the Christian it is of a piece with present experience, which is the "earnest" or the "firstfruits" of his coming inheritance. Thus, secondly, there is the nature of the experience which gives a present foretaste of that which eye cannot see nor ear hear nor heart conceive. It is in a word the experience of the indwelling Christ. Thirdly, there is the universal scope of this hope and experience. This is not expressly contained in the formula (except insofar as the you means primarily Gentiles, for such the Colossian Christians were), but is explicit in the immediately preceding words.

28. Paul has spoken of this as a "mystery" into which men must be initiated. The purpose of initiation, according to current phraseology, was to make a man perfect. Paul hastens to make it clear that he is not contemplating any esoteric initiation, confined to a selected few: no, it is his commission to instruct every man in the whole of Christian philosophy, so that every man may be a perfect initiate—this doubtless against an esoteric tendency present among the Colossian "heretics," as generally among Gnostics.

CHAPTER II

1-7. Paul and His Unknown Correspondents. Paraphrase: "I write thus because I want you to realize how deep is my concern for you and your neighbors of Laodicea, although we have never met—a concern that you should be consolidated in love and have a full understanding of that divine secret to which I have alluded. The secret is, in one word, CHRIST; for in him all wealth of wisdom and knowledge are comprised. If you have once grasped the secret, you will never be misled by any specious arguments. Although I am absent, I am watching with satisfaction the disciplined order and the solid front of your faith in Christ. So firmly maintain your Christian life and faith in the purity in which you received it; and be very thankful."

These verses apply what Paul has said of his commission to declare the "mystery" (126) to the Gentiles, to the particular case of the two churches of the Lycus Valley. Though he did not found these churches, and has never visited them, he yet feels responsibility for them, and wishes them to recognize the fact. Thus he passes from the general exposition of the fundamentals of Christian theology to a direct appeal to his correspondents to resist the allurements of the "heretics."

5. The words order and steadfastness are both military terms, and are doubtless used here with full intent of the Christian warfare (Eph. 6:10-17).

8-15. The Central Christian Experience as Security Against False Speculations. Paraphrase: "Do not be misled by any attempt to found religion on the 'Elemental Powers' instead of on Christ. For he is superior to all powers; the Totality of Godhead is in him; and in him you have all you need for full salvation. The only 'circumcision' worth the name is that which he gives, namely, the discarding of the lower nature through union with him (by baptism) in his death and resurrection. Yes; dead as you were in sin, God gave you new life when he forgave you and released you from all claims of the Law; in fact, abolished it by virtue of the cross of Christ. Thereby he triumphed over all Powers and reduced them to impotence."

8. Rudiments—read elements (R.V. mg.). The reference, however, is not to elementary knowledge, superseded by the fuller knowledge in Christ. The word was used technically in current religious philosophy of the time for spiritual beings supposed to animate and preside over the elements of the physical universe, and generally conceived as resident in the heavenly bodies. In syncretistic circles they were identified with the Princedoms and Powers of Jewish angelology (cf. 116).

9. For the fullness or totality, see above on 119. Bodily is "corporately" rather than "corporally." The totality of divine attributes is present as a whole in one "Body" or concrete individual personality, not distributed through a hierarchy of beings.

10. As the fullness of Godhead is in Christ, so he mediates a full religious experience; i.e., all that the religious life can require is to be found in Christ, and need not be looked for elsewhere. This is particularized in what follows.

11-13. Circumcision is for Paul the Jew a fundamental religious idea. The outward rite he cannot believe to have any worth (Rom. 2:28, 29), and when an attempt was made by Jewish Christians to force it upon Gentile converts, he strenuously resisted (see Galatians). Yet he could not abandon the thought that it symbolized something ultimately true. While, therefore, in dealing with early Jewish propaganda in Galatia he contented himself with a purely negative attitude to the rite, here he takes the view that the real circumcision is nothing less than the putting off—the cutting away (as it were)—of the body of the flesh, i.e., the whole organization of the lower instincts in man (or, as it might be put in psychological terms, the dissolution of "sentiments" organized about wrong centers); and this, he holds, takes place effectively only in a Christian conversion (v. 13; cf. Phil. 3:3). For that involves being united with Christ in his death (the decisive break with the bad past) and in his resurrection (the beginning of a new life). Such a conversion he held to be a true miracle, exhibiting the same power of God which was manifested in Christ's resurrection (cf. on 118). The mystical union with Christ which is the condition of this "death" and "resurrection" (raised, v. 12, quicken or make alive, v. 13) took the form of incorporation into the church, the "body" of Christ; and the incorporation took place by baptism, the symbolism of which was admirably adapted to represent dying and rising again (buried with him, v. 12). Paul cannot be thought to hold that baptism "in the flesh made with hands" would have any more virtue than circumcision with the like limitations. Only if baptism is in the given case a real moral death and resurrection is it "valid" (see Rom. 6:1-11). But Paul knew of no being "in Christ" which was not also being in the fellowship of the church, and so mediated by baptism.

14, 15. What was accomplished on the cross was a defeat of the principedoms and powers (=the "Elemental Spirits"; cf. 1:16). The Law was the sign and the medium of their rule over men (see Gal. 3:19 4:9, 10). Hence the abolishing of the Law—bond—ordinances—means their defeat: the rendering having put off from himself is probably wrong. The meaning is "having stripped" or "despoiled," as a triumphant warrior stripped his defeated foe of his arms. This word, therefore, as well as triumphing, is a military metaphor.

16-23. True Religion not Ascetic and Ritual Practices but New Life. (See also 3:1-4.) Paraphrase (including 3:1-4): "Let no one impose upon you food-regulations or the observance of holy seasons. These are shadows: Christ is the reality. Again, do not accept the censure of any one who lays stress upon asceticism and the worship of angels. With all his pretentious claims he is not loyal to our Head, who alone gives unity and power of growth to the body. The twofold Christian experience of death and resurrection should save you from all this: (a) By dying with Christ you have passed beyond the sway of the Elemental Powers; then why pay heed to ritual prohibitions which belong to their sphere? Such schemes of behavior, with all their show of philosophy, are really quite futile. (b) You are risen with Christ (3:1-4), and so you should be governed by motives arising in the unseen world where Christ is—for there your real life is, hidden now, but to be brought to light when Christ is manifested."

16, 17. The "heretics" passed judgment on members of the church who were careless about certain ritual regulations which they laid down. These appear to have been borrowed from Judaism. They consisted (1) of rules for clean and unclean food (meat) and (2) of the observance of special holy days, such as new moon and Sabbath, both Jewish festivals. Both food and divisions of time, as belonging to the material world, would for Paul and his adversaries alike come within the sphere of the Elemental Powers (the latter in particular because new moon and Sabbath mark the revolutions of the heavenly bodies, supposed to be intimately associated with these Powers; cf. Gal. 4:8-10). For them, it was religiously important to keep on good terms with the Powers; hence one must scrupulously observe all forms of taboo associated with material and temporal things. For Paul all that had become irrelevant (cf. Rom. 14:2-6, 14 1 Cor. 8:10 23-26). He had fought against the imposition of rules of this kind when they had been associated with the attempt to force the observance of the Jewish Law upon Christians. Now they cropped up again under the guise of "enlightenment" to bring men to a greater degree of "perfection," and he deals with them even more sternly. What would he have thought of the rigorous Sabbatarianism of later ages?

18. To borrowing from Judaism the "heretics" added definitely ascetic practices (for this is the meaning of the words translated humility here, and "will-worship," "humility" and "severity to the body" in v. 23). These were associated with the cult of angels (=the Elemental Powers). The phrase rendered dwelling in the things which he hath seen has long been a puzzle to commentators, and attempts have been made in ancient and in modern times to emend the text. It is now known that the verb was a technical expression in the mystery-religions for entering upon a certain stage of initiation. Paul is not careful to use it with precision; he adopts the grandiose style of the mystery-mongers in a tone of mockery. We might render the phrase "entering the portals of vision." The pretentiousness of all this kind of thing he thinks simply silly (cf. 1 Cor. 8:1), with its claim to the exercise of pure "reason" (or, as we might say, "higher thought"). It is, after all, he says, only a fleshly reason (mind), since it exalts the material to a place in religion which does not rightly belong to it.

19. The fundamental error is that this type of religion does not hold fast by Christ as the supreme Head of the body; and a body without a head has neither organic unity nor power of growth. In other words, the new tendencies in the Colossian Church are toward social disintegration within the Christian community.

20-22. On rudiments, see 28. Union with Christ in his death means that we have passed from under the domination of the material, and therefore owe nothing more to the Elemental Powers. Prohibitions affecting not imperishable moral principles but things that perish with the using are irrelevant to one who has died to the world.

23. This sentence as it stands in the original is scarcely intelligible, and some primitive corruption of the text is suspected. The words might be rendered "which commandments, though they make a profession of wisdom which rests rather on gratuitous asceticism than on any element of real worth, only serve to indulge the lower nature." If this is right, Paul is commenting on the often observed fact that asceticism in certain directions frequently provokes unrestrained self-indulgence in others.

CHAPTER III

1-4. New Life in Christ. (216-23 continued. See paraphrase of that passage.) The other side of "dying with Christ" is union with him in his resurrection. Morally that means the dominance of new motives and new energies which lift the conduct of life to a higher level. It is lived for and by eternal, not temporal values (v. 2; cf. 2 Cor. 418). Yet this does not mean a vague "spirituality," indifferent to the practical issues of daily life on earth (as Paul sufficiently shows in the following ethical section). For the eternal values are defined for us by Christ, as the unseen world is for us the world where Christ is supreme. If we are "in Christ," then our real life is in that world (v. 3). It is a hidden life, its meaning half frustrated at present by the intractability of our material environment; but it is real, and one day, when all that is material has passed away, it will be revealed—manifested—as the only real life there is. Meanwhile, we live most truly our own life when we refer everything to motives which are centered in Christ. For in the deepest sense he is our life (cf. Gal. 220).—The immediate relevance of this is to show that thoroughgoing Christianity emancipates the conscience from the trivialities of such ritual and ascetic disciplines as the "heretics" advocated. Religion always tends to fall back into that kind of thing; for many people in all Christian denominations that is what religion mainly means. But real Christianity goes deep beyond all such mere fussiness. In rebutting a false ideal Paul has at the same time laid the foundation for a positive construction of Christian ethics with which the following section of the Epistle is concerned.

5-17. General Principles of Christian Ethics. For Paul, Christian morality has a negative and a positive aspect. Paraphrase: "Certain things must be got rid of: these are not any ritual uncleanness, but lusts of the flesh and grasping self-assertion (you know what I mean from experience of your pagan days)—all sins of this kind, including anger, malice, and untruth. Such things as these constitute the bad self which you must put off as you would put off an outworn garment. Then you must put on a new self, divinely formed, functioning on a level where distinctions of race, culture, and social standing are irrelevant. The qualities of this new self are such as kindness, tolerance, forgiveness, and love, the bond that makes all perfect. Peace must be the governing principle of your inner life, as peace is the end of your organization in one body. The Christian message should be thoroughly familiar to you, and you may find much mutual instruction in poetry and song through which you express your thankfulness to God. And as you thank God through Christ, so all your conduct should have the mark of Christ upon it."

We have here a very brief outline of Christian ethics—no doubt a summary of the kind of moral instruction Paul was accustomed to give his converts. It is based upon the two-fold religious experience just described, and set in contrast with the morally irrelevant asceticism which has been rejected. The Christian has died with Christ; and that means, ethically interpreted, the abandonment of evil ways; and he has risen with Christ, and that means the acquisition of virtuous ways. The evil and the virtuous life are characterized concisely but with sufficient detail to give definiteness and concreteness to the moral ideal, positively and negatively. (Cf. the greatly expanded ethical outline in Eph. 425-520, and notes there.)

5a. In principle the "body of flesh," or the system of sinful dispositions, has been killed and buried, in baptism (212, 13). The ethical life demands that the surviving members or organs of this body should be actually suppressed. Then we have a curious transition from organ to function, made easier for Paul by the fact that in Hebrew psychology each member is thought of as individually responsible for its acts. (This survives in some popular ways of thought. Did not Cranmer say "This hand hath offended"? Cf. Mk. 943-48.)

5b-7. Cf. Eph. 53-8, and notes there, for the implied classification of vices. The words, upon the sons of disobedience, are not authentic here (see R.V. mg.); they seem to have crept in from the parallel passage in Eph. 56.

8. A further list of vices, falling under the general head of "grasping self-assertion" (on which see Eph. 53, 4, notes).

9-11. In Gal. 327 Christians are said to have "put on" Christ. To put on the new man is not very different in meaning (cf. Eph. 215 424). In both those places, as here, the new man is a creation of God; and here it is added that he is created after the image of God (cf. Gen. 1:27). For Paul, Christ is the image of God (1:15). Thus the new humanity is humanity "in Christ." That it is thought of corporately rather than individually is indicated by v. 11: in this new man (or new humanity) all accidental distinctions are transcended (cf. Gal. 3:27, 28—"ye are all one [person] in Christ Jesus"). Paul's mystical way of thought makes it possible for him to speak of Christ as a "corporate personality."

12. As the sin to which the Christian has died has been sufficiently characterized by a short list of typical vices, so here the life of virtue to which he is risen is characterized by a brief allusion to certain typical virtues. As on the negative side special stress was laid on anti-social sins, so here the most prominent virtues are those which have a direct social value (cf. Eph. 4:32-52).

14. Love, or charity (for which Paul, like other Christian writers, uses a word practically unknown to pre-biblical pagan Greek), is presented as the principle of perfection in the moral world. For the meaning which Paul attached to the term, see especially Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 13. It is not love as "tender emotion," but love as an organizing "sentiment" (to use the psychological terms).

15. The best commentary is Eph. 2:11-22 41-6 on which see notes.

16. Cf. Eph. 5:19.

17. Christians are baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus (1 Cor. 6:11; cf. 1 Cor. 1:13) with the confession "Jesus is Lord" (Rom. 10:9). The rite and the language used implied that the baptized person is the property of Christ. Paul here urges that his property-rights should be asserted in every word and deed of a Christian.

18-25. Christian Ethics in the Home. (See also 41.) Paraphrase: "Thus, it is a Christian thing for wives to show deference to their husbands and for husbands to love their wives; for children to obey their parents and for parents to show respect for the personalities of their children. Slaves should pay strict obedience to their masters, not to curry favor, but because all service is rendered to Christ, our Master and Judge. Similarly, masters (41) must treat their slaves fairly, for Christ is their Master too."

The only social area in which Paul applies his constructive principles with any particularity is the household, involving the three reciprocal relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and slave. The slavery with which he deals is domestic slavery; industrial slavery, which has provided most of the worst horrors of the system, does not fall within his view. For men of the ancient world the domestic slave was as much a member of the household, or familia, as the child. The treatment is very meager, and it must be confessed that we have no more than a slight and tentative beginning toward a Christian ethic of family life. But we must not miss the significance of the fact that there is any such section in the Epistle at all. In Paul's earlier thought, as set forth in 1 Cor. 7, the whole of family life belongs to the category of "the things of the world," and distinct from "the things of the Lord" (1 Cor. 7:32, 33), and the only Christian attitude to it is a detachment as complete as possible. At that time Paul was under the dominance of the belief that the end of all things was very close at hand (1 Cor. 7:29). His gradual emancipation from that belief now made it possible for him to recognize a positive value in existing social institutions. When Paul is criticized for apparently giving a Christian sanction to slavery and the subjection of women, we may well bear in mind that at least he came to see that marriage and domestic service must be somehow Christianized. As long as thought remained at the level of 1 Cor. 7, completely indifferent to family life, it could not begin to deal effectively with its problems. To admit that family relationships could be in the Lord (vv. 18, 20) was an advance that necessarily challenged further advance. In making this admission, Paul could hardly do other than start from social institutions—including slavery—fundamental to the civilization of his time, to the duties of which institutions he would give a Christian character.

18, 19. Wives and husbands. The naïve treatment here is expanded in Eph. 5:21b-33, which see.

20, 21. Parents and children. That obedience is the duty of children is good O.T. doctrine (hence the precept is in Eph. 6:1, 2 buttressed by a quotation of Deut. 5:16). The injunction to fathers, repeated in similar terms, Eph. 6:4, is more striking, and may be regarded as the first step in giving weight in ethics to the new valuation of the child-personality in the teaching of Jesus.

22-25. (See also 41.) Slaves and masters. The treatment is here fuller, possibly because Paul was at the moment dealing with a particular case of the master-slave relation (Philemon and Onesimus). To define the Christian position in this matter, he goes to root-principles. Essentially, there is no distinction of bond and free within the Christian Community (3:11). The Christian, whether bond or free, is the "slave" of his heavenly "Lord"—ye serve the Lord Christ. Masters, too, have a Master in heaven. For the slave, this means that he acquires a full moral personality, responsible ultimately to Christ alone. Slaves, therefore, must make of their earthly service a service of Christ, by conscientious sincerity in all they do. If they do wrong, it is Christ they have offended and he judges impartially (v. 25). This verse is to be referred to slaves, not, as the corresponding Eph. 6⁹, to masters; Paul had just dealt with a defaulting slave (cf. Philemon, v. 18). Similarly in Eph. 6⁵⁻⁸ the slave is to render service to Christ by obeying his earthly master in sincerity, with good will and singleness of mind. Masters are to "do the same," i.e., show the same "good will and singleness of mind," in relation to their slaves. So here, the master is to treat his slave with justice and equity (4¹).—The outcome of all this is to make the slave no longer a chattel but a spiritually free agent, whose dignity as a person is not to be outraged because he is allotted subordinate functions in society. This does not solve the problem of slavery, but it is a definitely Christian contribution to the solution of one of the cardinal problems of ancient society, though its full implications were not worked out in ancient times.

CHAPTER IV

1. See 3²²⁻²⁵, and notes.

2-6. Christian Ethics; Concluding Precepts. Paraphrase: "Be watchful and pray persistently (for me too, that I may have opportunity of telling the secret of Christ, though I am in prison). Show discretion in your dealings with non-Christians. Use every opportunity to the full. Cultivate grace and tact in speech."

2. "Watch and pray" is a precept derived from the highest authority (Mk. 14³⁸), introduced here as in Eph. 6¹⁸ to clinch all the moral exhortations.

3, 4. Paul claims a place in his correspondents' prayers, because of the special difficulty and the special opportunities of his present position. So also Eph. 6^{19, 20}. Here the request for prayer makes a parenthesis, for the writer has still some general precepts (corresponding to those in Eph. 5^{15f.}).

5. Religious enthusiasm is no substitute for common sense, especially when the religion is that of a minority. Outsiders deserve consideration (cf. Rom. 12¹⁷). Buying up the opportunity (R.V. mg.) rightly renders an expression borrowed from commercial language, where the verb means to "make a corner" in a commodity. Eph. 5¹⁶ assigns the motive, "because these are bad times." Just because all the powers of evil are abroad (cf. Eph. 6¹²), mustered for the last fight, every effort must be made to turn every opportunity to the best account in the good cause.

6. Seasoned. Paul employs a culinary metaphor. Tastes differ, and so the seasoning must differ. A form of address that would be acceptable to one person might offend another. Speech is with grace when it is considerate of the person addressed. Courtesy is thoughtfulness.

7-18. News and Greetings. Paraphrase: "Tychicus and Onesimus (a good Christian and one of yourselves) will tell you all my news. I am to give you greetings from Aristarchus, Mark (who may be coming to you; make him welcome), Jesus Justus—my only Jewish fellow workers; from Epaphras, who is one of yourselves (I can testify how deep an interest he takes in you and the other churches of the Lycus Valley); from Luke, our dear physician, and from Demas. Greetings to friends at Laodicea, especially Nymphas and the congregation in his household. After you have had this letter read, send it on to Laodicea, and do you read the letter from Laodicea. Tell Archippus to be thorough in his work for the Lord.

"And now a greeting in my own hand—PAUL. Remember that I am a prisoner. Grace be with you!"

7-9. The letter ends with personal matters. No detailed news is given, because Tychicus, the bearer of the letter, will be able to tell all that is necessary. He is accompanied by Onesimus, who is given a not unnecessary note of commendation.

10, 11. There follow greetings from Paul's companions. First Aristarchus (cf. Acts 27²), Mark (known to us from Acts as a companion of Paul and Barnabas, and here introduced to the Colossians, whom he intends to visit, as Barnabas' first cousin), and Jesus Justus (not otherwise known), who are described as Paul's only Jewish helpers; so understand v. 11, punctuating and translating as follows—... and Jesus Justus, who—and these alone of the circumcision—are my fellow-workers for the kingdom of God. The current translation commits Paul to an absurd exaggeration, and one contradicted by the next words. The other Jewish Christians of the locality must be supposed to have been of the Judaistic or anti-Pauline party.

12-14. Next, Epaphras, himself a Colossian, and one who stands in a special relation of responsibility to the three churches of the Lycus Valley (cf. 17. 8), Luke, Paul's physician, and one Demas (neither otherwise known to us, except from Philemon, v. 24 and 2 Tim.

410, which add nothing to the present passage). Luke is very likely the author of the travel-diary contained in the latter part of Acts, and according to persistent tradition the author of Acts and of the third Gospel. These three, therefore, were Gentile Christians co-operating with Paul.

15. Greetings to Christians of the neighboring city of Laodicæa, especially one Nymphas (or possibly the feminine Nympha) and a group of Christians belonging to his (her) household (either actually or for ecclesiastical purposes).

16. Paul has written at the same time to Laodicæa, and he gives instructions that there shall be an interchange of letters. The Laodicæan letter has almost certainly perished. Certainly, the Epistle which passes under that name in some MSS. is a forgery.

17. For Archippus, cf. Philemon, v. 2.

18. Paul has dictated the letter, as was his practice (cf. Rom 16²²); but he now adds a greeting in his own hand (cf. Gal. 6¹¹ 2 Thess. 3¹⁷). Such autographs at the end of dictated letters are known to us in many papyri of the period.

FIRST AND SECOND THESSALONIANS

BY PROFESSOR C. C. MCCOWN

FIRST THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

Paul's Previous Activities. In all probability the first letter to the Thessalonians is the earliest preserved writing of Paul as well as the oldest N.T. book. It is not, of course, Paul's first letter, nor is it the work of a tyro in missionary preaching or theological thinking. For fifteen years or more now he had been a Christian missionary engaged in vigorous labors in a wide variety of fields. He had been compelled to defend his faith against every type of national religion, mystery cult, and school of philosophy.

The Nature of Paul's Letters. Yet Paul was not a philosopher, and his letters were not deeply learned and carefully prepared theological treatises. Though not written to individuals, they partake of the nature of the private letter. Each was occasioned by certain definite conditions and problems in the church addressed. Particularly is this true in the case of the two short Thessalonian letters. Their difficulties are largely due to their personal and occasional character. Their interpretation depends upon a correct reconstruction of the circumstances of their origin.

Thessalonica. The date of 1 Thessalonians and the circumstances under which it was written are to be discovered from the letter itself and the relevant section of Acts (17-18¹⁷). Thessalonica, modern Saloniki, had a most favorable location. Lying at the head of the Thermaic Gulf, it had a good harbor and a hinterland of rich and well-watered plains. In Paul's day it stood at the center of that great artery of traffic, the Ignatian Way. Cicero, who went there during his exile a century before Paul's time, speaks of it as "placed in the lap of the empire." Its size, commercial importance, and trade connections explain the seemingly exaggerated language of Paul when he boasts of the large part which the Thessalonian church had had in the spread of the gospel (1 Thess. 1⁸). It was, moreover, a free Greek city ruled by its own officials (politarchs, Acts 17⁶), not a Roman military colony like Philippi or Corinth. It was sufficiently large to have a Jewish synagogue, which Philippi, apparently, did not possess (Acts 16¹³).

The Founding of the Church. Paul, Silas, and Timothy had been driven to this thriving metropolis by persecution at Philippi. When, after three Sabbaths of Christian preaching in the synagogue, the majority of his fellow Jews had rejected the new faith, Paul had founded a Christian synagogue consisting of a few Jews, many "devout (i.e., God-fearing) Greeks," and "chief (or honorable) women not a few." How long he was allowed to continue preaching to the new congregation we cannot know, but probably only for a few weeks, when the recalcitrant Jews had appealed to the prejudices of the mob and the loyalty of the politarchs and had driven him out of the city. Soon after they followed him to Berea and, though the Jewish colony there had received his message with favor, they compelled him to flee to Athens, whence he had gone to Corinth (Acts 17-18¹⁵ 1 Thess. 2², 17 3², 6).

The Occasion of the Letter. Paul had spent so short a time with his Macedonian converts and they had been so quickly subjected to severe persecution that he was most anxious as to their steadfastness. Circumstances had for some time prevented him from communicating with them. Apparently Luke, if he was the author of the we-sections of Acts (see intro. to Acts, p. 1095a) has been left at Philippi, and Silas perhaps at Berea. From Athens Paul sent Timothy back to bring him news of the churches in Macedonia (1 Thess. 3^{1f.}). Shortly afterward he and Silas came to Paul at Corinth with most encouraging tidings. At Corinth, then, in the winter or spring of 51 A.D., relieved of anxiety, full of joy, and engaged in an intense and successful missionary activity, Paul wrote this letter. At no other place in the narrative of Acts do we find the three missionaries together as called for by the proper sequence of events (Acts 18⁵ 1 Thess. 1¹ 3⁶).

The expressed reasons for writing were three, as follows:

(1) The church at Thessalonica was mainly Gentile according to the testimony of Acts (17⁴) and 1 Thessalonians (1⁹ 2¹⁴). It was natural—indeed, almost inevitable—that such a church should have difficulties with doctrines so novel as the Second Advent of Christ and the resurrection of the body, ideas utterly foreign to Greek thinking. To answer a question which had arisen in the minds of members of the church on these matters was one of the reasons for writing (413).

(2) Another of his purposes was to put the new converts on a firmer moral foundation. He wished to strengthen their hearts so that they might be blameless in holiness before God when Christ should appear for the Last Judgment (313). Coming, as they largely did, from the lower classes, being small tradesmen, freedmen, and slaves, some of Paul's converts were poorly instructed as to right standards of living, and the apostle gives a considerable proportion of every letter, as of this one, to instruction on questions, often most elementary questions, of moral conduct.

(3) The third expressed desire of the apostle was to encourage the Thessalonians to bear their persecutions and troubles without wavering (33-5).

Two other reasons for writing are not expressly stated but plainly implied.

(1) Apparently Paul had learned from Timothy and Silas that their absence and failure to communicate with the Thessalonians had suggested to the minds of some of these converts suspicions as to the apostles' motives. Such doubts were not wanting in plausibility. One of the most familiar figures in the cities of the early Roman Empire was the traveling philosophic lecturer. The literature of the period is full of jibes at him. Sometimes he was but a showy rhetorician, dealing in startling antitheses and moving climaxes. Others were rough and brutal curbstone orators, who affected the philosophic robe and staff and begging scrip and the manners and methods of Diogenes. But there were some who were sincere and earnest preachers of morality—real shepherds of souls. Such were Dio Chrysostom, Epictetus, and probably Apollonius of Tyana. If there had been no genuine, high-minded preachers of righteousness, the false imitators would not have been able to thrive. Among the Greeks and Romans the early Christian missionaries must often have been classed as philosophers. So Paul was rated at Athens (Acts 17:18), and at Ephesus he actually lectured in the school of a no doubt converted rhetorician daily from eleven to four (Acts 19:9, etc.; see Moffatt). When he and his companions disappeared from Thessalonica and their converts heard nothing from them, questions naturally arose in their minds. Had he forgotten them for new and richer friends? Was he in the business of preaching, like so many of these traveling lecturers, just for what he could get out of it? It was a charge which his enemies again and again made against him (2 Cor. 7:2 12:17), and evidently it had already cropped up at Thessalonica (1 Thess. 23f.).

Wisely Paul does not explicitly mention it, but he tries to counteract it in several trenchant verses (23-313).

(2) From Timothy Paul had also learned that there were divisions and jealousies in the church. Some were "walking disorderly," refusing to follow the leadership of the officers of the church and also spending their time, not in productive industry but in fomenting dissensions. For these the letter contains a few pointed sentences (512f.).

The Teachings of the Epistle. As a summary of Paul's missionary message 1 Thessalonians is especially valuable. The writer felt called upon to recapitulate the gospel that he had preached at Thessalonica. Therefore we may secure from the letter some idea of what his missionary message to a Gentile congregation must have been. No doubt he fed them, as he did the Corinthians, with milk, not with solid food (1 Cor. 3:1f.). An ethical monotheism, with emphasis on the wrath to come and Christ as the Saviour from that wrath, the present gift of the Spirit, a demand for moral living, the future coming of Christ—these seem to have been the burden of his preaching.

There are numerous Pauline ideas that are not emphasized in this letter. There is here no attempt to discuss such problems as the rejection of Israel, which occupies the space of three valuable chapters in Romans (9-11), the person and place of Christ, and the relations of the Law, works, and faith. Indeed, if one may judge by the context, "faith" in the letter to the Thessalonians (see especially 13 32, 5, 6, 7) means faithfulness rather than that combination of mystical trust in God and communion with him, which elsewhere seems to suit the Pauline usage.

Yet Paul's characteristic mysticism is everywhere implied. The peculiar phrases which express his "faith" occur frequently enough and in such connections as to prove that he had long used them. "In Christ," or some equivalent is found seven times (11 214 38 41, 16 512, 18); "through Christ," three times (42, 14mg. 59); "in God," twice (11 22); "in the Holy Ghost," once (15). When Paul speaks of the churches of God that are in Judæa "in Christ Jesus" (214), or of those individuals who are set over the congregation "in the Lord" (512), there is implied a long development of the idea that all the Christian's life is fundamentally a fellowship with the exalted Christ. Allusions to the Spirit and to prophesying (15, 6 43 519) imply the same phenomena of miracles (note "in power," 15) and vigorous religious emotionalism which the Corinthian church enjoyed (1 Cor. 12, 14).

Though Paul does not discuss the nature of God, incidental allusions show that he must have made a special point of preaching an emphatic ethical monotheism to the idol-worshipping Thessalonians (19), a "gospel of God" (22, 8, 9, 13). In contrast to their formerly accepted deities he had preached a "living and true God" (19 45). They are beloved by God and chosen by him (14). He has given them the Spirit (48) and their confidence rests upon God (18), to whom they turned from their idols (19). It is he who tries men's hearts (24), and before him they must be approved (13 212, 15 313 41, 3, 6f. 518). It is he who raised Jesus from the dead and will likewise raise believers (414). They live "in God" as they do in Christ (1 22).

The large place of Christ in Paul's thinking is clearly implied. He is God's Son (110). Paul prays to him as he does to God (311) and mentions him on equal terms with God (11), although in some matters he is subordinate to God (110 414). Their calling and election are from God (14 212), but it is Christ upon whom their hope of salvation depends (110 59), a salvation that was wrought by his death (510; cf. 215).

There is the customary Pauline emphasis on the Christian virtues. In two passages faith, love, and hope appear together (13 58), as in the famous hymn of 1 Cor. 1313, and faith and love together in one (36). Intended as it is to encourage steadfastness, this letter lays repeated emphasis on the Christian's joy (16 516), endurance (13, 10), and hope. Hope, not love, is here the climax of the trinity of virtues and the distinguishing mark of the believer (413; cf. 313).

Paul, however, is as little concerned to maintain a mere emotionalism as a merely formal adherence to Christ. Faith must bear fruit in strict morality. Spirit, soul, and body must be blameless (523). Fundamental to a vigorous and united church are peaceableness (411 513), mutual kindness (514), and, above all, love (312 513), i.e., brotherly love (49). Love is to be shown by doing good, not only to members of the local church and to Christians living elsewhere, but unto all men (410 312 515). Paul is much concerned that the Christian make a favorable impression upon those outside the church (412). Righteous living, therefore, is fundamental. Paul urges a high standard of purity and rigorous self-control in sex relations, but there is no hint of asceticism (41-8). The letter is unique in its emphasis on industry as a necessary element in Christian morality. Paul himself has worked with his own hands (29) and expects all Christians to do the same (411f.; cf. 2 Thess. 38-12). How much is to be read into the concise exhortations with which the letter closes (521f.) his longer writings can inform us.

All these exhortations are given especial urgency in view of the imminence of the Second Advent. This item of Paul's faith receives its fullest exposition in the Thessalonian letters. Twice in the first letter he prays that the new converts may be found blameless at the appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ (313 523), when he expects his own final triumph (219). They had turned from idols to serve God and wait for his Son from heaven (19f.). It is Christ who rescues believers from the wrath that is coming (110), a wrath that is already beginning to fall upon the disbelieving Jews (216) and is soon to come upon others who reject the gospel. But Christians, being called to God's kingdom and glory, will be saved from this wrath (212 110). How large the idea of the "Advent" bulks in Paul's thought at this time is indicated by the half-parenthetical reference to it in 219. The apostle expects at any moment to be compelled to give account of his ministry before his glorified Lord (cf. 51-4). His discussion and description of the Second Coming in 413-510 are sufficient evidence that it must have constituted an important element in his missionary message to the Thessalonians. (Cf. Rom. 118-32, notes.)

Paul's views on this subject seem to have undergone a modification of emphasis, but no radical change. In no other letters does he have so much to say regarding the Second Advent as in the two to the Thessalonians. It may be that the difficulties which his preaching of that doctrine had raised in this case rendered the apostle somewhat more cautious in his future missionary activities. He may have sensed the dangerous excesses to which undue emphasis upon the subject might lead. That he entirely abandoned this hope, however, can hardly be proved. Allusions to the Second Coming in later letters even down to Philippians clearly imply a continued expectation of that event, even though at the last Paul himself may no longer have hoped to be among those living to see it. See 1 Cor. 729-32 1511f. Rom. 818-24 Phil. 320f. These passages fit perfectly into the scheme of 1 Thess. 413-511 and 2 Thess. 21-12. (See McCown, The Promise of his Coming, pp. 170-177.)

Genuineness of the Epistle. In spite, then, of the admitted peculiarities, there is no reason to suspect the genuineness of the letter. The characteristic ideas of Paul are practically all implied, if not explicitly stated. The allusions to his missionary activity in Macedonia and to his movements fit so admirably into the framework of the book of Acts that the trust²² worthiness of both documents is plainly indicated. The one apparent discrepancy, the statements in Acts (17¹⁵ 18⁵) which imply that Timothy had not been with Paul at Athens (cf. 1 Thess. 3^{1f.} 5¹), only serves to strengthen the evidence by showing that neither is dependent upon the other. The fathers at the end of the second century, Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, and Irenæus, accept the letter without hesitation.

Textual Problems. Textual difficulties of importance are few. In 27 the word ēpioi, "gentle" (A.V. and R.V. text), is to be preferred to nēpioi, "babes" (R.V. mg.). It is clearly better suited to the context though the latter is the better attested. The previous (Greek) word ends in n, which might easily be repeated to change the unfamiliar ēpioi (elsewhere in the N.T. only 2 Tim. 2²⁴) to the familiar nēpioi. In 32 the reading "God's fellow worker" (for "God's minister") found in some western MSS. is attractive as a basis for explaining the variants (cf. A.V. and R.V.). In 33 the change of sainesthai, "shake like a dog's tail," to siainesthai, "be unnerved," has much to commend it, though it is found in only two uncial MSS. In 54 "as thieves," found in the codices Alexandrinus and Vaticanus, is to be preferred to "as a thief."

Analysis of Contents. The main divisions of the Epistle are as follows:

- I. Superscription, Thanksgiving, and Prayer, 1¹-3¹³.
- II. The Two Chief Problems: Morality and the Resurrection, 4¹-5¹¹.
- III. Suggestions as to Church Discipline, 5¹²⁻²⁴.
- IV. Conclusion, 5²⁵⁻²⁸.

Literature: Ellicott, St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians; Milligan, St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians; Moffatt, The First and Second Epistles to the Thessalonians (Expositor's Greek Testament, vol. iv); Frame, The Epistles of St. Paul to the Thessalonians (International Critical Commentary); Plummer, A Commentary on St. Paul's First Epistle to the Thessalonians; A Commentary on St. Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians; Hayes, Paul and His Epistles.

CHAPTER I

1. The Superscription. In his adaptation of the formal epistolary greeting Paul associates with himself Silvanus (doubtless Silas, Acts 18⁵ 2 Cor. 1¹⁹ 1 Pet. 5¹²) and Timothy (32. 6 Acts 18⁵ 2 Cor. 1¹⁹), in a fashion unusual but not unknown in Greek letters between intimate friends and relatives. Almost the entire letter seems to have been written with this plural authorship in mind, much more clearly so than in the case of 1 and 2 Corinthians and Colossians. With the originality of genius Paul turns the word employed in the Greek letter for "greeting" (chairein) into "grace" (charis), using a noun derived from the same root, but of vastly fuller meaning, and to it he adds the Semitic salutation, peace. The formal address is turned into a genuine expression of Christian good will.

The greeting here is the shortest found in Paul's letters; the following thanksgiving (see above, "Analysis") is the longest. The character of this section as a thanksgiving and prayer (cf. 12 2¹³ 39^{f.}) allows Paul to remind his readers of much that will serve to encourage them and bind them in affection to their apostle and his Master. It is the warm outpouring of an affectionate nature, guided and controlled by keen insight and practical good sense.

2-10. A Model Church. Paul emphasizes his continued personal interest and encourages them by praising their Christian character (vv. 2^{f.}), and by recounting the happiness and enthusiasm of their conversion (vv. 4^{f.}) and their steadfast and exemplary conduct (vv. 6^{f.}), putting them on their mettle also by mentioning their widespread reputation as exemplary Christians (vv. 8-10).

3-7. In v. 3 is an even fuller and richer exposition of the rounded Christian character than the more familiar 1 Cor. 13¹³, for it indicates the value of the fundamental traits of the Christian. Faith produces practical activity, love undertakes toilsome labor, hope supports endurance in view of the imminent return of Christ (cf. Col. 14⁵ Gal. 5⁵ 2 Thess. 14). All their labor is performed under the watchful eye of God, who will not fail to take note of it, for he has loved them and chosen them. Of this they can have no doubt if they remember the circumstances of their conversion. Not without a touch of pride Paul recalls the miraculous manifestations, the sense of the Spirit's presence, and the full conviction on the part of the new converts which had accompanied the preaching of the gospel. In the persecutions they had been compelled to bear they were only imitating their leaders (cf. 2¹⁴ and Acts 17⁵⁻⁹), but their spirit had been such that they had become the model church of Greece and Macedonia.

8-10. The reverberation of the word of the Lord in Macedonia and Achaia (the latter is the Roman province of Greece) seems to imply an extensive missionary activity with Thessalonica as its center. Moreover, if everywhere—the exaggeration is pardonable—people are prepared for the gospel message by the story of their enthusiastic reception of it, how can they become discouraged and turn back? Three of the chief elements of the missionary preaching of those early days seem to be indicated in this passage. For the phrase wrath to come (v. 10) see below, 216

CHAPTER II

1-12. The Apostles' Conduct Defended.

The allusion to the Thessalonians' experience of salvation easily and naturally paves the way for a paragraph describing the apostles' conduct among them and indirectly defending it against possible suspicions. The missionaries had not really resembled the mercenary charlatans who posed as philosophers and preachers of morality (see p. 1264a).

1, 2. Their entrance to the hearts of the Thessalonians (cf. 19) had not been with an inane message but one which, in spite of the sufferings of the apostles at Philippi (Acts 16 22-40), had been bold and powerful, even in the midst of renewed conflicts with persecutors. These verses take up 15. Endurance of opposition and persecution also served to prove their sincerity.

3-6. For the appeal of the Christian missionaries did not have its source in delusion (or error), like many rival philosophies and religions; nor in uncleanliness, such as was exemplified in the worship of Aphrodite at Corinth, where Paul was writing; nor in deceit (or guile), as seen in wandering philosophers and strolling priests of cults such as those of Dea Syria (described by Apuleius, The Golden Ass, viii, 24-ix, 10). Since God had tried their inner motives and had approved them and intrusted them with the gospel, they were concerned to please him and not men. Therefore, unlike the popular preachers of the time, they had presented no flattering message, they had come with no fine pretext to cover their greed, they had no desire for fame, though, as apostles of Christ, they had the right to be held in honor and be a (financial) burden to their converts. (There may be an intentional play upon this double meaning in the phrase of which the translations claim honor (use authority, A.V.) and be burdensome exchange places in the text and mg. of the English versions.)

7, 8. Instead of conducting themselves like proud and grasping rhetoricians, the apostles had been gentle (see p. 1266a), treating their converts as a nurse does her own children, with self-sacrificing tenderness. The word translated affectionately desirous, hitherto unexampled elsewhere in Greek, has been discovered by Ramsay in a fourth-century inscription, used by heathen parents of a deceased son (Milligan, Expositor, ix, 9, Sept., 1925, pp. 226f.).

9-12. Paul appeals to the conduct of the apostles in Thessalonica as evidence of the sincerity of their purposes. The toil and weariness which they had seen the missionaries undergo as they worked night and day so as not to be a burden to their converts (v. 9) and their blameless conduct (v. 10) as well as the fatherly love they had shown (v. 11) and the high moral standards they had insisted upon (v. 12) should convince the Thessalonians of the purity of their aims. The application to a certain type of modern popular preacher is evident.

13-16. Renewed Thanksgiving at the Recollection of Their Former Relations. Quite naturally the account of the apostles' conduct in Thessalonica leads to another reminder of the heartiness of the new converts' reception of them as true messengers of God. Then they were convinced that the gospel was not merely a human concoction but a message from God, who had attested its genuineness by working in the hearts and lives of the believers. If, now, they were tempted to doubt its divine origin because God had failed to protect them from persecution, they should remember that they had then unhesitatingly accepted persecution as the lot of believers, thinking of themselves as walking in the footsteps of the first Christians in Judæa, who had suffered persecution from the Jews as the Thessalonians had at the hands of their heathen fellow countrymen. Persecution need not disturb their faith, for the Lord himself as well as the ancient prophets and the present missionaries of the gospel had been compelled to endure it. The thought of the Jews' responsibility for all this stirs the apostle. They were displeasing God and showing their animosity toward all men (a suggestion of anti-Semitism) in hindering the apostles' preaching of salvation to the Gentiles. They were thus rapidly adding to the weight of their sins in the scales of God's justice, and the wrath of God, i.e., the woes of the last days and the punishment to follow the final Judgment, was hanging over them. The last clause (v. 16c) is found in the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, Levi, vi, 11.

17-20. The Apostles' Continued Personal Interest in the Thessalonian Christians. (See also 31-13.) Having thus reconstructed the atmosphere of hopefulness and mutual confidence which existed when he was with them, Paul proceeds to show that he and his companions had not forgotten them as soon as they had gone elsewhere.

The keenness of his personal feeling for the Thessalonians is emphasized by the terms he uses in v. 17. More than once he especially had tried to return. Satan himself was back of the circumstances that had prevented. Why should he not wish to see them? They are his hope, his joy, his crown of glorying (or pride). The last phrase comes into his mind along with the thought of the expected parousia, the visit of the Lord, and reminds him that they are the crown with which he will honor the Lord when he comes, just as cities or princes honor the emperor with a crown at his official "visit" (cf. Milligan's Commentary, pp. 145f.).

CHAPTER III

Additional Evidence of Paul's Interest. Evidence to this interest, begun in 2¹⁷, is continued throughout ch. 3.

1-5. The Sending of Timothy. Paul's deep personal interest in the Thessalonians was further demonstrated by his continuing alone his missionary labors in Athens, and later in Corinth, that he might send Timothy back to Thessalonica. Silas had probably remained in Macedonia (Acts 17^{14f.} 18⁵). The emphatic "I Paul" of 2¹⁸ supports the view that the we of this section is entirely editorial, but does not prove it. The purpose of Timothy's visit was twofold: (1) to establish and encourage the Thessalonian Christians, and (2) to relieve the apostle's anxiety as to their steadfastness. The mention of their tribulations leads to another assertion of the inevitableness of these sufferings, even as he had told them in advance.

6-8. Paul's Joy at News from Thessalonica. The relief to the apostle's mind when Timothy returned is vividly expressed by the expression he uses: Timothy brought us glad tidings is, literally, preached the gospel to us. They had desired to see him as he did them—a delicate hint that he had had as good reason to doubt them as they him. Vv. 7f. refer to the discouragements and difficulties he had faced alone at Athens and Corinth (Acts 18^{5f.} 1 Cor. 23).

9-13. His Thanksgiving and Prayer. Paul again returns to the epistolary framework of thanksgiving and prayer. What adequate thanksgiving could he render to God for the joy they occasioned him? In these verses he expresses in heartfelt fashion his longing to visit them and complete their instruction in the Christian way of life and his desire that they may increase and abound in the Christian graces and be morally blameless, so that they may be ready for the imminent "visit" (coming) of their Lord with its ensuing divine judgment. The word translated saints in v. 13 and in 2 Thess. 1¹⁰ means "holy ones," and is often applied to the angels (see Zech. 14⁵ Deut. 33² Jude v. 14, 1 Enoch 19). Since Paul usually employs the word for "Christians," its meaning here is uncertain.

CHAPTER IV

With 4¹ begins the second main division of the Epistle (see intro., "Analysis").

1-12. Exhortations as to Christian Conduct. Having thus allayed suspicions of ulterior motives and callous forgetfulness on his part, Paul is ready to attack directly the two chief difficulties of the Thessalonian church. For the first section, which urges strict morality (vv. 1-8) and brotherly conduct (vv. 9-12), he had prepared by his prayer that they might be found blameless. Even a model church might improve. The purpose of God for them is that they be devoted to a holy life. The clauses which follow plainly define this sanctification as sexual purity. (1) Christians must avoid fornication, which means all manner of sexual impurity. (2) Each must possess himself of his own vessel in all purity of thought. This may mean either control his own body or secure for himself a wife. The latter meaning for the expression seems preferable in view of ancient usage (cf. 1 Pet. 3⁷). The clause may be translated: that each of you respect his wife and keep her to himself in all purity (Frame). (3) Above all in this matter, i.e., in regard to sins of the flesh (not in any matter, i.e., business, A.V.), one must be especially careful not to invade the rights of another Christian home, perhaps a reference to some actual case at Thessalonica.

9-12. On the positive side he urges brotherly love, which includes almsgiving, for thus mainly, no doubt, they showed their love for Christians in other places. In this fundamental virtue (cf. Gal. 5¹⁴ Rom. 13^{8f.}) again the model church could grow in grace. Apparently, Paul's exhortations to quietness, minding one's own business, and working with the hands bore small fruit (see 2 Thess. 3⁶⁻¹⁵). The exhortation to consider the impression their conduct makes upon non-Christians is characteristic (cf. 5^{15f.} Rom. 12¹⁷, 18 13^{7f.} Col. 4⁵).

13-18. The Resurrection and the Second Coming (see also 5¹⁻¹¹). This section evidently grows out of a report from Timothy or other information to the effect that some of the Thessalonian Christians were in doubt as to the fate of those of their number who had died since their conversion. How could the dead share in the glory of the Second Advent?

To Greeks, who had never heard of the resurrection of the body, this was a natural question. The "farewell" frequently found upon tombstones of this period is indicative of the sorrow without hope that prevailed widely in the ancient world. Passages in the O.T. and the Jewish apocalypses, as well as heathen inscriptions, speak of death as an "eternal sleep." "There is hope among the living, but hopeless are the dead" (Theocritus, Idyls, iv, 42). Paul tells the Thessalonians that those who are asleep—a characteristic but not original Christian designation of the dead—were to share in the joyful welcome to the returning Saviour. He does not answer the fundamental question as to the nature of the resurrection. That he attempts in 1 Cor. 15. Here he merely seeks to dispose of the Thessalonians' anxieties as to their friends who were "asleep." They should rise even as Jesus had, and that before the "rapture" of the living. The Lord will appear with a command for them to rise, with an archangel's shout, and the sounding of a divine trumpet. The Christian dead will be raised first; then the living, among whom Paul expected to be numbered, will be snatched in clouds into the air to meet the Lord (so read v. 17), and thereafter they should be always with him—a most comforting assurance for these harassed and persecuted Christians.

CHAPTER V

I-II. Reticence Concerning Times and Seasons. (Cf. 4:13-18.) Paul here sounds a warning which later millenarians would have done well to heed. No one could know the times and proper seasons when these things should take place, for, as Jesus had repeatedly assured his disciples (Mk. 13:32=Mt. 24:36; Mk. 13:33-37 Mt. 24:42=Lk. 12:39f.; Mt. 24:50=Lk. 12:46 Mt. 25:13) and Paul had taught the Thessalonians, the day of the Lord (the O.T. phrase is applied to Christ's Advent for the purpose of judging the world and vindicating his own) was to come as unexpectedly as a thief in the night. The inescapable punishment would fall when least anticipated. But the Christian, prepared for the Judgment by righteous living, need not fear. The phrase thief in the night suggests to the apostle an interesting and apposite figure. The Christian is living in the light of day. He not only need not fear the thief in the night but he must live in the light of day. He must be neither drunken nor asleep, as people are at night, but awake and sober. Clad in the Christian's armor (cf. Eph. 6:13-17), he is sure of his rescue from sin and punishment, for God has chosen him and Christ died for him. The waking and sleeping of v. 10 mean life and death. (For a fuller discussion of Paul's views on the Second Coming see p. 1265b and below on 2 Thess. 2:1-12).

12-24. Suggestions as to Church Discipline. The practical turn which Paul so characteristically gives his discussion of the Second Coming prepares for a concluding section of detached exhortations tactfully addressed to all the church but intended, no doubt, for a particular group. There probably was friction between the leaders and some whom they had admonished, and the latter are urged to know, i.e., respect and appreciate (cf. 44), and love their leaders who labor to weariness for the church. V. 14 is intended to support the leaders in their efforts to discipline the disorderly and also to suggest the variety of needs with which they must deal. The disorderly, i.e., idle busybodies, the easily discouraged (or fainthearted), and the weak must be treated each according to his disposition and all must be regarded with magnanimity. No spirit of revenge can be tolerated either within the group or toward those without it (v. 15). Joy, prayer, and thanksgiving mark the normal Christian spirit (vv. 16f.). Vv. 19-22 are a condensed summary of the more explicit instructions given later to the Corinthians (1 Cor. 14). While the ecstatic gifts of the Spirit and prophesying are to be given legitimate range and not despised, they are to be tested by their fruits. Vv. 23f. put into a brief prayer the ideals which are uppermost in the writer's mind: peace, that complete purity of life and spirit which makes ready for the coming of the Lord, and finally the certainty of that Advent and its rescue of the faithful from the sins and sufferings of life, a certainty based on the faithfulness of God.

25-28. Conclusion and Benediction. The closing sentences are probably autobiographic (cf. 2 Thess. 3:17). Like those found in many letters, ancient and modern, they are disconnected injunctions and greetings. The earnestness of the adjuration that the letter be read unto all the brethren suggests more of division and quarreling in the church than one would otherwise suspect.

The benediction takes the place of the customary good wish of the ordinary Greek letter, "I hope that you are in good health." Paul's chief desire for his converts was spiritual grace, not mere bodily health. It is a final illustration and confirmation of von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf's description of Paul's letter style as being "Paul, nothing but Paul, inimitable though often copied."

SECOND THESSALONIANS

INTRODUCTION

The Occasion and Purpose of the Letter.

The circumstances under which 2 Thessalonians was written are more difficult to determine with certainty than those of 1 Thessalonians, since the letter is less personal in its tone and less detailed in its references to its occasion. Apparently, the first letter had soon been answered by the leaders of the church. The Thessalonian elders had deprecated Paul's praise of the church (see on 13). They were praying that they might be found ready when Christ should appear, but many at least were disturbed, fearing that it would be impossible for them to develop the necessary graces and purity of life if, as they understood Paul's letter to imply, the day of the Lord was already upon the world (110, 11 22). Some of the disorderly whom the first letter had rebuked had refused to accept reproof (311, 14) and had possibly rejected that letter as a forgery (317), while others had been excited to greater fanaticism by the supposed imminence of the Second Advent. In general, the situation had not greatly changed—for but a short time, perhaps a few weeks or months, may be supposed to have intervened—but what change there was was for the worse. The mood of the apostle also had altered. The happy relief from anxiety over the Thessalonians which marks the first letter is replaced by disappointment at the new difficulties which had arisen. Moreover, unrighteous and evil men (22), probably the unbelieving Jews of Corinth, were disturbing the apostle. The tone of the second letter is, therefore, less buoyant, affectionate, and intimate, and somewhat more official and severe than that of the first. Its thought centers around two classes—those who are disturbed or discouraged by the dreadful imminence of the day of the Lord, and those who are disorderly.

Evidence Against Its Authenticity. The argument against the letter receives its strongest support from the peculiar combination of similarities in language and alleged differences of thought to be discovered by comparing 1 and 2 Thessalonians. Many sentences in 2 Thessalonians sound almost as if they had been copied, somewhat laboriously and clumsily, from 1 Thessalonians (cf. 1 Thess. 12f.=2 Thess. 13; 213=213; 311f.=216f.; 41f.=31f.; 524=33; 523=316), while one whole section which is new is largely a canto of O.T. phrases (18-12). Yet there are some words and turns of expression which are not elsewhere found in Paul (eternal destruction, 19, the parenthesis in 110, manifestation, or appearing, 28; cf. 1 Tim. 614 2 Tim. 110 41, 8 Tit. 213). The difficult phrase by epistle as from us (22) raises a question, and the undisguised attempt to guarantee the letter's genuineness might easily be a forger's device. The purpose of such a literary forgery (to use a modern ethical judgment too harsh for ancient custom) would probably have been to gain the support of the apostle's name for the views as to the Second Advent expounded in 21-12 and for the disciplinary measures advocated in 36-16. (See p. 188a.)

Evidence for Its Authenticity. The difficulties which this theory seeks to explain cannot be denied, and the problem cannot be said to have been definitely solved. But the case against the authenticity of the letter is not so strong as has been thought by some. It must be especially noted that the passage on the Second Coming does not embody the current Jewish-Christian ideas as to the signs of the end. It says nothing of earthquakes and wars, of falling stars and darkened suns. It merely insists that the time is not yet. Paul may not elsewhere state this view as here, but it is not inconsistent with 1 Thessalonians, and, for all that we read in his other letters, he may have held it until his death (see intro. to 1 Thessalonians, "Teachings"). The change in Paul's views during the ten or twelve years covered by his letters has often been overemphasized. The letter was known and accepted as genuine by Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Irenæus, Tertullian, the Muratorian Canon, and Marcion. It seems to have been used by Justin Martyr, Polycarp, and probably the Epistle of Barnabas. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose that it was written after 100 A.D. The external evidence is even stronger than that for 1 Thessalonians.

Textual Criticism. There are but three words of importance about which there is noteworthy difference of textual attestation. On 110, was believed, see commentary. In 23, anomias, "of lawlessness," the reading of the Sinaitic and Vatican MSS., the Coptic Version, several Fathers, including Tertullian, and the R.V.mg. is preferred by the majority of modern scholars to hamartias, "of sin," of the R.V. text. In 213 the R.V.mg., as first fruits, suits the context better than from the beginning, though the latter has the better attestation.

Analysis of Contents. The main divisions of the Epistle are as follows:

I. Superscription, Thanksgiving and Prayer, 11–217.

II. Injunctions as to Conduct and Church Discipline, 31–15, and Conclusion, 317, 18, to 1 Thessalonians, p. 1266.

Literature: See literature under introduction

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Superscription. The superscription of 2 Thessalonians differs but slightly from that of 1 Thessalonians, but the change to our Father adds a sense of intimacy to the Christian fellowship, and the addition specifying the divine source of grace and peace decidedly strengthens the sense.

3–12. Encouragement. The section really constitutes one sentence. It is grammatically involved, but clear as to meaning.

(1) Paul insists (vv. 3f.) that their faith, love, and patience have deserved high praise. The emphatic we are under obligation to give thanks . . . as is fitting (so read v. 3), which is peculiar to this letter (cf. 2¹³), was doubtless occasioned by deprecatory remarks in the letter from the Thessalonian leaders to Paul. It is this disclaimer and the discouragement which it revealed that led to the partial repetition of 1 Thess. 12–4 in 2 Thess. 13^f. Their discouragement calls forth the emphatic reiteration of the claim that the apostles have a right to be proud of the Thessalonian church.

(2) They need not be discouraged, their ultimate vindication is sure (vv. 5–10). The writer adroitly represents their very persecutions, along with their patient endurance of them, as a proof that God's judgments are righteous. Otherwise, how could God justly reward them and punish those who do not believe? The Advent and judgment are for the author something promised in sacred Scripture. But the prophecy is impossible of fulfillment unless there be persecutors to be punished and suffering saints to be saved and vindicated. The cross must precede the crown. Because they are bearing the cross they may feel sure of the crown. The same idea of certain necessary preliminaries to the day of the Lord is seen in 21–12. If so be in v. 6 is, of course, ironical. A large part of vv. 8–10 is made up of quotations from the O.T., and the rhythmic structure of the passage suggests that it may be an adaptation of a Christian hymn. The parenthetical phrase of v. 10 as usually translated implies that the Thessalonians are to share in the promised glory because they had believed in the apostles' testimony. The Greek, however, is difficult, and such eminent scholars as Markland, Hort, and Moffatt accept a slightly attested reading which gives the meaning, our testimony (i.e., that Christians must suffer) has found confirmation in your case, a sense that does not so well fit the context. On saints see 1 Thess. 3¹³.

(3) Vv. 11f. may be paraphrased thus: "In order that this glorious experience may be yours we continually pray that God may consider you worthy to receive the heavenly rest to which he called you, and so may mightily bring to fruition every good intention and every work that springs from faith, in order that our Lord Jesus may be glorified in you and you in him."

CHAPTER II

1–12. The Delay of the Second Advent. This section, turning away from material strictly consonant with thanksgiving, was probably written in direct answer to reports which had come from Thessalonica to the apostles, perhaps in the letter from the church. Some members, at least, had been greatly disturbed over the supposed imminence of the parousia, the expected Advent of Christ, which Paul had so vividly described in his first letter. It would appear, however, that it was not merely his letter that had unsettled them. He tells them (vv. 1f.) that they were to be disturbed neither by spirit, i.e., ecstatic prophecy, nor by word, i.e., oral teaching, nor by letter, as if by (not from) the apostles. The last phrase, as if by us, may apply to all the three preceding; i.e., either a misunderstanding or a misinterpretation of something the apostles had said or written had caused the difficulty. Unfortunately, the explanation intended to set them right is couched in such involved and intentionally mysterious language that, though its meaning was doubtless clear to the Thessalonians, we are at a loss to understand it.

In the interpretation of apocalyptic terminology three points must be borne in mind: (1) The ancients used it with reference to persons and events of the present and immediate future. There was no thought of long ages to come. Paul believed, as his language plainly implies, that the parousia of Christ, the Second Advent, would come before his death (see intro. to 1 Thessalonians.) The powers or persons to whom he alludes are, therefore, to be sought in his own time and environment. (2) The technical apocalyptic terms, such as "apostasy," "man of lawlessness," the "restrainer" (Satan), and parousia, had long been in use. They had been handed down from previous writers and in their Greek form often represent attempts to reproduce the peculiar ideas of one language (Hebrew or Aramaic) in another of an entirely different genius. (3) The ultimate origin of many apocalyptic ideas and phrases is to be sought in ancient polytheistic mythology. Back of this passage, it seems certain, is the old myth of the primæval dragon which revolted against the gods. In the beginning this monster had been conquered and chained but not destroyed, and it would, in the last days, reappear and make a final, desperate attempt to regain the mastery of the world. (See Bousset, The Antichrist Legend; Oesterley, The Evolution of the Messianic Idea, pp. 83-107; McCown, The Promise of His Coming, pp. 47-51; also arts., this Commentary, pp. 188, 206, 843.) It is to this expected embodiment of evil that Paul is referring, though we must beware of reading into Paul's language all the ideas either of previous Jewish writers or of later Christian works such as Revelation.

Paul had instructed the Thessalonian Christians in his beliefs on this subject. Here he is merely reminding them of what they were supposed to know well. Unfortunately, we have no means of ascertaining what his views were in detail, and we shall never be able to interpret all of his language with certainty. In its general purport, however, his meaning is clear. The Advent of Christ was not immediately to be expected. The outline of future events as Paul anticipated them is perhaps as follows: (1) a preaching of the gospel to the whole inhabited world, while some power held the forces of evil in leash; (2) the removal of the restraining power (v. 7) and the development of unbelief and opposition until it culminated in the great falling away (or "apostasy") led by the lawless one; (3) the appearance of Christ on the clouds to visit summary punishment upon the wicked and to reward the righteous by transforming their bodies into a form suitable to the kingdom of God which was to be inaugurated upon a transformed earth.

3, 4. Paul and his circle evidently accepted the common idea that the end with its terrible judgment could not come upon the earth until the wicked had filled up the measure of their sins, and God was thus fully justified in punishing them (cf. 15-10 and 1 Thess. 2¹⁶). A great apostasy must first occur, led by a human embodiment of lawlessness, who is, therefore, peculiarly marked out for perdition, or destruction, and who is the exact opposite of the divine but claims a place of superiority to every divine being or object of worship. He will go so far as to enthrone himself in the Temple and proclaim himself as God (cf. Mk. 13¹⁴ Dan. 11³⁶). These traits may be an allusion to the deification of Oriental monarchs and of the Roman emperors, possibly to Caligula's attempt to set up his statue in the Temple.

5-7. The time for the "mock" Advent is not yet come. Paul had foretold it but had also explained that some restraining power was preventing the lawless one from revealing himself, in spite of the fact that the energy which was behind him, though hidden, was already at work. Some have supposed that Paul regarded Claudius as the one that restraineth now. More likely, the restraining power and person is the Holy Spirit (see especially v. 6). Only Paul's converts, whom he had personally instructed, could know to whom he referred. If he were alluding to the Roman Empire, he might well be cautious about committing to papyrus his ideas as to its overthrow. If v. 7b refers to the emperor, it might be thought highly seditious.

8-12. The restrainer gone, the false messiah would have every opportunity to deceive the multitudes by spurious miracles, signs, and wonders (cf. R.V.mg., and Mk. 13²²=Mt. 24²⁴ Rev. 13^{13f.}), which were to authenticate his coming (parousia), just as real miracles accompanied the first Advent of Christ and were supposed to guarantee the genuineness of every divine manifestation (cf. Deut. 13¹⁻³). Because men had refused to believe the truth, God would give them up (cf. Rom. 1^{24, 26, 28}) to belief in falsehood, and they with their deceiver would be justly and terribly punished for their sins.

13-17. Renewed Thanksgiving and Prayer. The thought of the fate of unbelievers suggests to Paul the contrasted happy future of believers, and he turns again to thanksgiving, which, he insists, is justified. Having been beloved, chosen, and called by God as firstfruits (mg.) of Europe, the Thessalonian Christians needed only to stand firm and hold (fast) the traditions which he had given them both orally and by letter. May they be comforted by the certainty of their hope and be active in well doing!

CHAPTER III

1-5. Observations and Admonitions. Vv. 1f. appear to refer to the missionary labors of Paul and his companions at Corinth and the opposition which they were encountering from unbelieving Jews. But if men are faithless, the Lord is faithful and he will save them, not only from evil men, but from the evil inclination (cf. R.V.mg.) which would lead to disaster, for Paul is convinced that they will remain faithful to his instructions (vv. 3f.). Love for God and the patience which fellowship with Christ produces are necessary (v. 5).

6-16. Directions for the Discipline of the Disorderly. It would appear that Paul's brief and general admonitions to the disorderly in

1 Thess. 5¹²⁻¹⁵ had not been heeded. It is often assumed that the disorders mentioned in this section, especially the refusal to work, were due to expectations of the imminent Advent which, it was thought, would render labor unnecessary. This can neither be proved nor disproved. The meaning to be assigned to walking disorderly is to be gathered from the following verses. It involved living in idleness at others' expense and being busybodies instead of busy (v. 11). Both in word (v. 10) and by example (vv. 7f.) Paul had handed down to them the Jewish tradition of the value and necessity of manual labor. The importance of the matter in Paul's view is shown by the measures of excommunication which he urged against the disobedient. His personal interest in the individual comes beautifully to the surface in the final injunction not to treat such as if they were beyond reformation.

17, 18. Conclusion. Paul probably availed himself of the services of some friend who wielded a ready pen, or of a slave trained to the task. His own handwriting was large and angular (Gal. 6¹¹ "large letters"). This specific mention of the authenticating subscription along with the phrase by letter as if by us (22) may point to a forgery in his name. But it seems more natural to suppose that it was noted because the disorderly at Thessalonica had refused to accept as genuine his former letter.

THE PASTORAL EPISTLES: FIRST AND SECOND TIMOTHY AND TITUS

BY PROFESSOR W. J. LOWSTUTER

INTRODUCTION

The Term "Pastorals." The term "Pastoral Letters" is so commonly applied to 1 Timothy, 2 Timothy, and Titus that it is natural enough to suppose that they have been so known "from the most ancient times." As a matter of fact, the term is comparatively modern; for while Thomas Aquinas (1274) applied to them the term "pastoralis," it was Paul Anton (1726) who introduced the habit of referring to these letters as "the Pastorals"; other scholars took up the classification, among them the great English scholar, Alford (1849), with the result that the term has passed into universal currency.

Appropriateness of the Term. In some ways the title is appropriate. It fastens attention at once upon the fact that the letters were written from the pastoral point of view. It was no essayist who wrote these letters but a man of affairs whose concern was not to air views or discuss theories for the sake of doing so, but to provide for actual situations. There is the air of life about them; they suggest the parish, not the cloister. While they have become world-literature, known and appealed to wherever Christian leaders have organized converts or believers into Christian churches, they clearly give the impression that they were written for specific times and particular parties. They belong to their own age and setting, however valuable they may be for all ages. We find ourselves reading here so many pages from the daily record of a great pastor, part of whose work was to train pastors and provide leadership for the churches he had helped to found. We see him facing the possibility that perhaps he was soon to leave his whole parish to the care of others, and his heart was concerned about a successor. The writer knew the situation in Ephesus, Crete, and elsewhere, the need of leaders who, equipped by personal attainment in Christian experience and by training for Christian service, would confirm converts, build up believers into a Christian community, exercise wise discipline and see to it that new recruits should ever be in training for the propagation of the glorious faith of Christ. He believed thoroughly in pastoral efficiency, the efficiency that comes only through discipline and training. Both the prophet and the propagandist in him discerned the need of trained leadership for the gospel. In these little letters to two of his younger friends the great apostle published to all ages his conviction that the church must ever have a trained ministry.

Limitations of the Term. On the other hand, the term "pastoral" is somewhat unfortunate, mainly because it raises expectations and gives presumptions which are not realized. The letters cannot be described as a compendium of church management, ministerial discipline or parish methods. It is misleading to refer to them as a "manual of church life," because there are so many phases of pastoral and parish work not touched upon (Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles, p. 15). The term is especially not happily applied to 2 Timothy. While it fits 1 Timothy and Titus much more truly, even they are too incomplete as to pastoral instructions, duties, and methods to qualify as a handbook on practical theology. The modern worker will find all too many of his problems untouched, but he will find here many valuable suggestions for the oversight of a modern church. Better, he will find here ideals and inspiration to furnish him new zeal and devotion for his task; better still, he will find opportunity here to keep fellowship with a Great Pastor, contact with whose spirit must make any man a truer son of God and a better minister of Jesus Christ.

Did Paul Write the Pastorals? On this point there has been great difference of scholarly opinion and persistent controversy. There have been those who have enthusiastically and ably defended the Pauline authorship, including among many others, Adeney, Barth, Findlay, Hort, Knowling, Lightfoot, Plummer, Ramsay, Sanday, Weiss and Zahn. Among those who have challenged it are men like Davidson, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Meyer, Weizsacker, and others, who credit the pastorals to a later hand. Then, there are a large and growing class of critics like Bacon, Harnack, Deissmann, Harrison, McGiffert, Moffatt, Lock, Peake, and others, who have found embedded in these letters certain genuine Pauline fragments, such as Tit. 3:12-15 2 Tim. 1:16-18 4:6-8, etc., small unpublished notes, historical paragraphs from the pen of the apostle, incorporated in these larger documents and issued later by some Paulinist who wished to exercise the apostle's influence and authority in administering the situation to which they were directed. In doing this he thought he was expressing accurately the apostle's mind. He was evidently quite familiar with Pauline thought and usage and, consciously or unconsciously, imitated or reproduced in striking measure the characteristics of the apostle. The practice and precedents of his age would fully account for his so writing and justify him in doing it. (Cf. pp. 855a, 942.)

Alleged Objections to the Pauline Authorship. Those who deny the Pauline authorship do so on four main grounds.

(1) There are marked divergences from the Pauline writings in vocabulary and in other linguistic features. For a detailed study of these divergences, see Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles. Most of these divergences could be accounted for by the character of the subject matter and by Paul's increasing years.

(2) The personal attitude of the writer is held to be incompatible with Pauline authorship. Timothy and Titus are old and tried friends of Paul, yet they are addressed here in an almost patronizing way, and are given advice which seems to imply a doubt as to their dependability. It is difficult to see, however, why a man of Paul's years and experience should not write in this style to those who, after all, were much younger than he, and for whose activities he felt himself responsible.

(3) The Pastorals mention visits to Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3), Miletus (2 Tim. 4:20), Troas (2 Tim. 4:13); a mission in Crete, and possible missions in Gaul and Dalmatia (2 Tim. 4:10); also other activities which it is difficult to fit into the story of Paul's life in Acts.

This difficulty is a real one. The only way it can be met is by assuming (a) that Paul was released from the Roman imprisonment of Acts, and returned to the East to visit Ephesus, Troas, Miletus, Corinth, Crete, etc.; (b) that during this time he wrote 1 Timothy and Titus; and (c) that later he was again arrested, and from this second imprisonment wrote 2 Timothy.

The crucial question is whether Paul was actually released from the first imprisonment at Rome. There are good reasons for believing that he was. It is incredible that he should have been put to death on such indefinite and insufficient charges as those preferred at his first arrest (see Acts 25:27). Upon a second arrest the charges could be more specific and dangerous. Paul evidently anticipated release from his first imprisonment; he wrote hopefully about a favorable outcome of his trial to both Philemon (v. 22) and the Philippians (2:19-24) and arranged for another visit with them. A difficulty is found in the fact that he told the elders of Ephesus they should not see his face again (Acts 20:25), but, according to the Pastorals, they did see his face again. When Paul so spoke to those elders he was closing his ministry in the east with a definite plan to turn west through Rome to Spain; he did not expect to see them again; a return seemed utterly improbable. But after four years in prison he found it necessary, upon his release, to look after affairs in the eastern churches before he could follow up his plans to go to the West, to Spain. It is simply the case of where a man in the light of developing circumstances felt compelled to change his plans, as many another good man since has done. There is nothing in the letters from the first imprisonment that indicates decisively that his first imprisonment ended fatally. Church tradition has preserved certain references, variously estimated, in support of a release and of labors in Spain (Clement of Rome, Acta Pauli, the Muratorian Fragment, etc.). Weiss, Lock, and others rightfully emphasize that no valid reason can be given for denying a release and no proof can be cited that actually disproves it. The Pastorals presuppose a release. This allows very reasonably for the various historical references which otherwise prove so hard to manage. Upon release, he could revisit his old churches, renew contact with old work, open new work in Crete, Dalmatia, and Gaul, plan for a winter at Nicopolis, leave a cloak and books at Troas to be sent for in a short time after he had again been thrown into prison, and from a second imprisonment write that his course was finished, his case without hope in imperial courts. (Cf. art., Life and Work of Paul, pp. 941-3.)

(4) The Pastorals presuppose a high degree of church organization which many claim appeared at a later time than Paul. Yet there is plenty of evidence in the N.T. to such organization as is here implied. When Paul and Barnabas were returning from their first campaign in the Gentile missions, they (Acts 13, 14) organized their new converts, appointed elders, provided for discipline and thus planned for the establishment of these churches. In Thessalonica and Corinth (1 Thess. 5:12 1 Cor. 5:1-5) similar arrangements were made for organization and discipline; brethren were called to official leadership who exercised every function implied in the Pastorals. As the congregations grew and became more permanent, very naturally the necessity for better organization would increase; official distinctions, discrimination of duties, division of labors, provision for discipline and proper control and other features of organization that are incident to the attempt to teach men and women to live together in a group, would develop and receive more emphasis. The Pastorals, written near the end of Paul's life, fit naturally into both this expectation and the known facts of church organization.

Altogether, therefore, the evidence is favorable to the Pauline authorship. After all, the problem of the Pastorals is not primarily one of Pauline dictation but of Pauline mind and spirit. Other hands may have been upon these writings in the transmission, but their touch has not affected the portrait of the great apostle himself. In the Pastorals, we find still the man who kept fellowship with Jesus Christ, and who counted all things loss for the excellency of Christ; only, where we meet elsewhere the Enthusiast for Christ we meet here the Statesman for Christ, providing with care for "the church which is his body."

Paul Revealed in the Pastorals. We assume, then, that Paul was released from his first imprisonment and that he afterward wrote these letters. Ramsay says he was released in February, 62 A.D.; Deissmann and Turner argue for a year later. The constant tradition that eventually he sealed his ministry with a martyr's death during the Neronian persecutions places his death before the close of 68. Hence these letters may be dated between 62 and 68. Their order is disputed; we would place 1 Timothy first, followed by Titus and 2 Timothy; but many put Titus as the earliest, followed by 1 and 2 Timothy; others put Titus last. Paul was still campaigning when he wrote 1 Timothy and Titus; it is hopeless to determine his activities accurately, as Zahn and Ramsay have tried to do. He commissioned Timothy and Titus to take his place in supervising the work in Ephesus and Crete and presumably elsewhere. They were to rejoin him shortly, but both letters imply in their content and in the attitude of the writer that the commission was to be permanent. The apostle was turning over his work to these men. His emphasis upon the technical and external grew naturally out of the situation. This was the kind of coaching they needed; these were the things that could not be disregarded if they were to prove good ministers of Jesus Christ. The church must have the Spirit; it must also be trained, taught, and disciplined if the Spirit is to bring forth its rightful fruits. The apostle saw that this could best be accomplished by proper organization, by trained leadership and by effective administration. He was not substituting these things for faith and the things of the Spirit so prominent in the other letters; he was insisting that orderly, disciplined, consistent conduct in church, home, and the individual is essential to spiritual attainment. Character and Christian excellence thrive best under discipline and come to richest, surest fruition under orderly care. 2 Timothy was written from prison; Paul felt the end was near and wanted his beloved Timothy with him. This letter is exceedingly personal, yet even here the apostle's anxiety that Timothy should be efficient in church administration, a workman approved unto God, crowds to the front and shows his concern in behalf of his successor.

The Commission of Timothy and Titus. The great statesman of the church who dictated the Pastorals wrote from the personal point of view. His problem is the equipment and training of those upon whom is to devolve so shortly the care of his churches. What were some of the duties he was most concerned to have these delegates fulfill?

(1) They were to teach. Religion always has a message. God has something to tell people. The prophet's work never ceases. Where there is no knowledge, no vision, the people perish. Other things the church should have; intelligence about God and his Word they must have. More important than his methods or technique is the teacher's message. It is his first duty to learn the things of God, to be initiated in the life of the Spirit, to know the secret and power of righteous living. Paul was a master builder when he stressed as he did the teaching function of the church leader. In his judgment, Timothy and Titus were primarily the religious experts of the community and whatever else they wrought for the churches they were to inform their people and make them intelligent about religion. The phrase "sound teachings" (mg.) or "sound words" occurs some half dozen times in the Pastorals (1 Tim. 1¹⁰ 6³ 2 Tim. 1¹³ 4³ Tit. 1⁹ 2¹) but it can hardly be construed as meaning a standardized body of doctrine. What Paul was asking was the kind of simple, straightforward, wholesome instruction that called for clean, moral, self-controlled living, that insisted upon outward as well as inward holiness, that demanded that Christian conduct should exemplify Christian doctrine, that set up Jesus' type of living as the standard and pattern for Christian discipleship, and that asked for renewed character as the gospel's best apology. A glance over the repeated demands for the simple requirements of a healthy, normal Christian life will confirm our interpretation and show that the aim and end of the teaching was holy living, not doctrinal correctness. Paul's helpers were building men, and doctrines were of importance only as they contributed vitally to that work.

(2) They were to select and train others to teach and to supervise the work of other teachers. They were to guard the faith as others transmitted it, see that emphasis was properly placed and that idle speculation or pretentious learning was not substituted for the moral and spiritual requirements of the gospel. Part of their task was the correction of false teachings to which believers were exposed either from pagan contact on the outside or from misguided teachers within the church. All this work, the attention both to teachers and teachings, received the emphasis it did because of the important part it played in determining the character of believers.

(3) They were to oversee the organization and administration of the church. This was largely provided for by the selection of proper officials and leaders. It was the finest kind of statesmanship that regarded leadership in this strategic way and sought to provide leaders worthy of the faith. In choosing them great weight was laid upon personal qualifications, as though the first requirements for true leadership were genuine Christian character and experience. The influence and power of the official, his usefulness in edifying believers or in making converts, was measured more by what he was than by what he knew or what he said.

(4) These delegates were to exercise discipline, always a delicate, difficult, thankless duty, though often a salutary and a needful one. The peddler of dangerous teachings or of unseemly tales, the man who neglected his own needy kin, the pretender who traded the form of righteousness for its power, the offender against the common decencies of life, the official who misused or abused his office, the brother who would continue practices discountenanced even by pagan standards, all called for correction and discipline. The discipline was wholesome, administered for the sake of the offender in the hope that he might be reclaimed, and for the benefit of the church to provide against the contagion of bad example and the influence of harmful precedent. The prophet can come with gentleness (1 Cor. 4²¹) or he can come with sternness and a rod. Paul stood sponsor for that neighbor love which seeks another's good with an intensity of devotion which both suffers for that other and allows that other himself to suffer that he may attain his best. These letters prescribed disciplined life both for individual and church in pursuit of holiness.

The False Teachers. The trouble-makers described in the Pastorals as false teachers were within the church. Otherwise Timothy and Titus could have exercised no jurisdiction over them. Just what they were teaching is indeterminate and for that reason doctrines and speculations have been ascribed to them which belong to a later period in church life. They were regarded as false teachers because they were disloyal to the great trunk lines of ethical and spiritual requirements along which Paul built his missions. They liked to hear themselves talk, they were addicted to vain words, they affected scholarship, resorted to display, and appealed to traditional precedents. They were self-seeking, coveting reputation and influence, and possibly they had financial gain in mind. Their work was dangerous in that it shifted emphasis from essentials, encouraged careless living, broke down ethical distinctions, removed moral restraints, and overthrew discipline. By teaching and by personal attitude they threatened the morale of the whole church. References to myths, genealogies, law and circumcision indicate that some of these false teachers were Jewish converts who had not learned the true character of the gospel. It is possible that there was also an element of asceticism on the part of some extremists who forbade marriage, restricted the eating of meat and prescribed certain physical exercises as essentials of religion. These teachings needed the censor's blue pencil, not because of their esoteric, speculative character but because they perverted the ordinary truths of Christian living and misrepresented the faith even in regard to ordinary sins. They subverted the simple requirements of Christian character; their words did not befit sound, wholesome teaching; they engendered strife; led foolish souls away from Christlike conduct; wrecked the faith of those who could be persuaded that religion according to the gospel is something else than obedience to the law of Christ and a personal likeness unto him in all the activities of life. It was the moral results of their work, the unwholesome type of living and thinking they invited, the demoralization of Christian character they encouraged, that made these teachers false and called for their discipline.

The Ministry and its Orders. What is the evidence as to the development of ministerial orders? (1) Bishops—overseers—are mentioned in 1 Tim. 32-7 and in Tit. 17-9. (2) Elders—presbyters—are mentioned in 1 Tim. 5¹⁷⁻¹⁹ and Tit. 15,6. (3) Deacons are mentioned in

1 Tim. 3⁸⁻¹⁰, 12. And the following are also frequently recognized as official orders: (4) Deaconesses, 1 Tim. 3¹¹; and (5) Widows, 1 Tim. 5^{9, 10}. Bishops also find mention in Paul's address to the Ephesian elders at Miletus, Acts 20²⁸, and in Phil. 1¹; presbyters or elders, in Acts 14²³ 15^{2, 22, 23} 20¹⁷, etc. Timothy and Titus were admonished to use great deliberation and discretion in the selection of these officials. Every precaution was to be taken to prevent the calling or ordination of unworthy candidates. Strange to say, the thing we should most naturally expect in this connection, the thing we have a right to expect, is missing, namely, a list of the duties pertaining to these officials and their relations one to the other. In place of this what we have is a list of the personal qualifications to be required in candidates for office with emphasis almost entirely upon moral considerations. Academic and ecclesiastical requirements are practically ignored. The several lists of qualifications are so similar, so nearly identical, that discrimination of the several terms is exceedingly precarious. The complicated development of ecclesiastical offices and distinctions in the later church naturally gave rise to the need of precedent and authority. Appeal was made to the Pastorals to this end, and the custom grew up of justifying this later ecclesiastical development by the Pastorals. This has given these terms an official significance and imputed to them a refinement of distinctions which the letters themselves do not guarantee. How many separate offices were referred to by the terms "bishop," "presbyter," and "deacon"? Did they refer to different orders of the ministry or were they synonymous or were there only two officers indicated, one being referred to in two ways? Or did these terms confuse office, order, and the functions of office? On such questions Christian thought has long been divided. The early Christians invented none of these terms; they found all coined and in common currency and appropriated them to their own use. The term "elder"—presbyter—was thoroughly familiar in Jewish usage and, no doubt, throughout the empire; among the Jews it held a certain degree of official significance but nothing at all to correspond with or justify the dignity and authority accorded it in later Christian usage. So the term "bishop"—episcopos—was equally familiar in Greek usage to describe one who was called to preside at meetings and exercise oversight of varying degree and dignity in any organization; it enjoyed no such implication of exalted place and authority as the Christian bishop soon came to have. "Deacon" was a term found everywhere and indicated a servant or employee whose duties were various and indiscriminate, with no suggestion of official dignity; he was to serve, to minister to the will of some master. There is nothing in the Pastorals to show plainly that these terms had as yet acquired clear distinctions of meaning. They seem to be used without discrimination so far as bishops and elders are concerned. While duties are not enumerated, certain ones are implied, but no duty or dignity is implied for a bishop that is not just as clearly implied for an elder; qualifications for both are without distinction. There is reason for believing (1 Tim. 3¹³) that the deacon was a less significant official, who could hope to attain higher office through good service.

Critical opinion still differs most widely over this matter. The distinction between bishop and elder is the point at issue. Some contend the terms were simply synonymous and identical while others make them quite distinct, designating separate offices and orders; and these raise the bishop to the more exalted order. There are those who insist that the term "bishop" referred not to an office but to a function of an office; the term "elder," or "presbyter," designated an office; the term "bishop" designated the function of oversight; in which case the bishop and elder were the same person; as elder he was an official; the function of his office was episcopacy or oversight. Others reverse this with the explanation that there was no office of elder; the elders were simply the older and more experienced members of the church from whom an overseer or bishop was chosen. Again we are informed that both terms primarily designated function; and bishops were elders with special prerogatives. The normal deduction from the records would recognize the term "deacon" as describing a minor official or office and the terms "bishop" and "elder" as interchangeable designations for officials of the same rank, with the possibility that "elder" was the more general term for the superintendents or leaders from whose number the one asked to preside was more and more generally spoken of as the bishop or overseer. (For fuller discussion, see Hort, The Christian Ecclesia; Allen, Christian Institutions; Vincent, Commentary on Philip-pians; Parry, The Pastoral Epistles.)

Some Great Teachings from the Pastorals. The character of these writings makes exact analysis difficult, but certain teachings stand out prominently.

(1) God's work will be best served and advanced by orderly, careful methods.

(2) The disciplined life and the disciplined church furnish the finest medium for transmitting the power of the Spirit.

(3) The supreme qualification for any Christian worker is character.

(4) The greatest service one can render the cause of Christ is personal influence and holy example.

(5) The sins that break down the cause and shipwreck faith are the ordinary sins.

(6) Pagans or outsiders will never respect a faith with lower standards of living than their own.

(7) The church may rightly be described as a school for character.

(8) The one all-inclusive work of the church is to build lives after the pattern of Christ. Living is the final test of all religion.

These Epistles are therefore not merely ecclesiastical, but share the N.T. ethical emphasis.

Literature: Moffatt, An Introduction to the Literature of the N.T.; Lock, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on The Pastoral Epistles (International Critical Commentary); St. John Parry, The Pastoral Epistles, with Introduction, Text and Commentary; Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles.

FIRST TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

For the general introduction, see the preceding discussion.

Timothy the Man. Timothy had been associated with Paul long before he received this letter. He was of Jewish heritage on his mother's side, with a Greek father, who along with his grandmother and mother became converted to the gospel on the occasion of Paul's first visit to his home-town, Lystra (Acts 14). When Paul returned for a second visit (Acts 16¹), he claimed the young convert as a helper in his gospel campaigning. From the frequent mention of his name both in Acts and the letters, it is evident that he has been in constant fellowship with Paul ever since. This letter suggests they had lately been together in Ephesus, and when Paul left he committed the work there to Timothy. Parry (The Pastoral Epistles) makes the very interesting and probable suggestion that before Paul's departure Timothy had been consecrated or ordained as Paul's special delegate or successor, to have supervision of the churches and to exercise authority over them such as he had not had before. This together with Paul's knowledge of Timothy and of the situation will account for the character of much of the advice given. The letter is very personal and betrays the apostle's concern for the younger man whom he regards as a son, but it also vibrates with the writer's ceaseless interest in the churches. "Ye are in our hearts to die together and to live together" (2 Cor. 7³). The letter was the outcome of his desire to help Timothy administer the churches so well that he would prove himself a good minister of Jesus Christ and enable the churches to fulfill their proper function in the rearing of godly men.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Greeting. Paul writes to Timothy as a friend; he also writes him as an apostle, one who is under orders from his Lord. It is the King's business on which he addresses him. The word mercy is added here to the usual greeting of the apostle. The phrase God our Saviour is one of the new phrases of the Pastorals, where it appears six times. The idea, however, is basic in Pauline thinking; all his gospel rests back ultimately upon the fact that the God revealed in Jesus Christ is a saving-God. The great discovery Paul made upon the Damascus road was that Jesus was right in telling men that God is friendly and forgiving. He gloried in being the servant of One who would save.

3-11. The Teacher's Stewardship. Paul and Timothy have previously discussed the problem occasioned by certain members at Ephesus—purposely left unnamed—who want to teach. Their work is having disastrous results. Forgetting or ignoring the fact that teaching is a stewardship (dispensation) from God and that the end or goal of the teacher's charge is to instruct and train in that kind of living which is marked by love, clean thinking, pure conscience and loyal obedience to God, they are raising all kinds of questions and discussing subjects that are irrelevant and have nothing to do with restraining men from sin and helping them to learn righteousness. Their interest is their own personal ambition rather than the good of their hearers. It is possible that their chief fault lies in insisting upon teaching when they are not prepared to do so; such teachers can do sad damage. Evidently, they bolster up their pronouncements by citation of law and appeal to fear (v. 7). The Christian is the last man who needs to fear the law. The law is not made for a man who is striving to live honorably and righteously as is the follower of Christ. The chief criticism of these teachers in Ephesus is their failure to give their hearers sound doctrine (v. 10), i.e., teaching morally wholesome and conducive to spiritual health (see pp. 1276-7). Timothy's problem is how to persuade them to give up their unprofitable teaching and devote themselves to that kind of instruction which produces wholesome life and conduct, a real stewardship of faith.

12-17. A Gospel That Saves. In a paragraph that seems disconnected Paul gives thanks to God for his personal knowledge of a gospel that saves; though he had once been a blasphemer, a disputer and destroyer of the faith—possibly a false teacher—the gospel had brought him wholeness of spirit. It is a faithful saying (v. 15)—a phrase he employs repeatedly in the Pastorals to emphasize some truth that is wholly reliable—it is the gospel's most blessed truth, that Jesus came into the world for that very purpose of saving sinful men. Paul offers himself as a proof of his saving power and argues that if the gospel could save him, the chief of sinners, it can save any sinful man who will believe on him who hath been sent by the King Eternal. Is Paul here telling Timothy that the gospel which was strong enough to show him the error of his way and save him unto the truth in Christ is also strong enough to help him correct the false teachers and make them wholesome?

18-20. Passing on the Trust. The charge Paul is passing on to Timothy is simply that which has been intrusted to him. Timothy is to be even as Paul has been, a propagandist for Jesus, a teacher of the wholesome doctrine of the gospel and supervisor or overseer of all the interests of the work of Christ. The instructions that follow in 21-62 may be taken as illustrating what he means by the charge. Judging from this, Paul is not writing to give a finished statement of the faith nor to compile a complete manual of church duties and church government. The trust committed to him is his ministry in the gospel with all that that involves. Paul is writing to strengthen Timothy's personal morale for the many duties confronting him. The prophecies which led the way to thee (mg.) were probably the indications and advices which convinced Paul that he should ordain Timothy as a minister and possibly appoint him as his successor in the care of the churches. Timothy can hope to succeed in his work only by keeping faith with Christ in his own life; to do otherwise means shipwreck as in case of Hymenæus and Alexander, whom Paul disciplined in the hope of saving them.

CHAPTER II

1-7. The Ministry of Intercession. The universal character of the gospel inspires an interest in all men. Let the Christian worker pray for all and labor in behalf of all. A prayerful attitude toward kings and those in authority will disarm suspicion against the Christians and leave them quiet and unmolested to pursue their work. There is but one God, and the gospel worker should have the same attitude toward all men and the same interest in saving them that God manifested in sending Jesus to show his compassion for men and his longing to win them to himself. In his timely coming Jesus revealed the friendly will of God and gave himself, as unreservedly as one ransoms a friend, to make every provision necessary for the saving of men (v. 5). This Christlike attitude toward others, this passion for the saving of all men, lies at the heart of the Christian ministry. With a vehemence that is unexpected here, Paul recalls his own appointment as teacher and apostle of this universal gospel which intercedes for all men.

8-15. Living and Praying; Place of Women. Believers are to pray often, in every place, whenever they come together. Timothy is to teach them that prayer has its conditions. If it is to be effective and prevail, it must be re-enforced by consistent conduct. Let men remember that we lift our prayers to God with holy hands, by clean and holy living; that we pray better by conduct and character than by words alone, however fine; that ill will and unfriendly disposition toward others will defeat any verbal praying in their behalf (cf. Psa. 243f.). "He prayeth best who loveth best." Women are reminded that a Christian woman's best adorning, her finest testimony to the gospel and her best way of making religion attractive, is not costly apparel, precious jewels or modish appearance, but good works, winsome womanliness and godliness of character. Paul shares the thought of his age in relation to women. They are not to aspire to leadership, to preach or teach nor to take precedence over men (v. 12). This is prudential advice dictated by the needs of the age for the good of the cause, and to be revised when the good of that same cause justifies it. It is to be remembered that Paul employed and commended Priscilla, Phœbe and other women helpers. In this letter, he sanctions the employment of deaconesses (311) and official-widows (59). While he recognizes woman's limitations and supports it by appeal to the Eden story, he points out that she has a wonderful ministry to fulfill; she is to find her greatest ministry as mother and home-maker. God has no greater work to offer. She shall help save the world by the children she bears and rears; in bearing and rearing children her religion shall be her strength. Some see here a reference to the incarnation, reminding us that through the Son one woman bore we are saved.

CHAPTER III

1-13. Choosing Church Leaders. In this paragraph attention turns from advices for the whole church to a discussion of its officials, namely, the bishop, the deacons, and the deaconesses. No mention is made of their duties, how they are chosen nor of their ordination. It is injudicious to make these records say what they do not say in regard to these officials. Whatever technical development may have taken place in such matters, evidently Paul does not attach as much importance to them as he does to the character of the officials, the kind of men who are going into the ministry and becoming leaders in the church. His whole interest here is upon personal equipment; the requirements dwelt upon pertain almost exclusively to matters of conduct and character (see intro., p. 1277b). Their teaching and "ruling over the church" will be influenced most of all by daily living, by consistent illustration of the faith. In preaching to outsiders, in maintaining the betterness of the gospel, in winning converts and establishing believers, it will be conduct, not creed, character, not controversy, practice, not precept, that will play the weightier part. Christlikeness is wondrously attractive and contagious. If some of the advices seem needlessly simple and elemental in regard to the most ordinary moral virtues and practices, it is to be replied that a minister can nowhere else fail so disastrously as in these essentials of holy living. The man from mission lands is telling us to-day that our failure there is not due to our teachings but solely to the way supposed Christians have behaved themselves.

1-7. The Bishop. Whatever his other qualifications—and we take it for granted that the rigid insistence upon moral excellence implies a like rigid scrutiny of his other qualifications and a similar demand for high standards of excellence in other respects—he is to be a man whose personal life will be an asset to the church, whose living will "give no handle for criticism." The requirements were written for first-century Christians living in contact with a civilization for which these requirements might seem very high and exacting. The church was bold to oppose old standards and to expose the sinful character of so many popular practices. It still takes fine courage to insist that religion must be clean and straight-going both ethically and morally.

The bishop is to be the husband of one wife, a specification that finds its most probable explanation as an instance of the gospel's conflict with the current practices in forbidding or protesting against polygamy, a legal custom of the empire. This was part of the attempt to combat the loose sexual life of the age and raise all life to a level of holiness. Again the bishop is not to be a tippler, a slave to wine or other excess, nor a contentious man too ready to settle difficulties with violence or his fists, arbitrary and hard to live with. Neither is he to have an itching palm for money. On the contrary, he is to be abstemious, self-controlled, hospitable, and courteous, both personally and socially. Other marks in one who would be a bishop are aptness in teaching, attentiveness to the business of his office and ability to preside, take charge, and rule; the discipline he maintains in his own home will indicate how he would rule in the church, for the church is truly only one great family, the household of faith. The work of the bishop is too serious to be entrusted to a novice, or new convert or one without the maturity of experience. Such a man should command the respect of outsiders for himself and the faith.

8-10. Deacons. Deacons may be lower in office but the demand for moral refinement, holy living, and consistent character on their part is not one whit lower. Let the deacon show a worthy dignity, let him control his tongue, his appetites, and his desire for gain; let him maintain the faith by conscientious living. A man is to be made a deacon only after he has been properly tested; the office is too important to be trusted to the untried. When he has served well as a deacon he may hope to be qualified for higher service. If women are received for service, they too are expected to qualify for office by the same blamelessness of conduct and holiness of character. Note the high assumption through all this discussion that elevation to office is justified solely by thought of service. Office means service. To serve well one must attend on the school of discipline. He who will lead well must first learn to follow. The disciplined life promises the richest service.

14-16. The Mystery of Godliness. It is not easy to understand why, if Paul hopes soon to rejoin Timothy, he should write him so elaborately about the oversight of the church. It must be that Timothy is making an experiment new to him, in superintending the churches, and Paul's eagerness to have him succeed manifests itself in writing these many instructions with which he hopes to aid him in persuading men to conduct themselves as members of the church. The necessity for all this instruction, all this discipline of the members, all this guarding of tuition, all this enforced care over the qualifications of officials, is to be found in the character of the church. It justifies all this care and concern because the church is the household of God, his family, to whom he has committed his truth and through whom he will establish it in the world. And beyond controversy it is a great revelation which the church should embody and express in the lives of its members. It is nothing less than finding the secret of godliness, how to live godly lives, how to become like God. This marvelous secret the church has learned through her great Lord Jesus Christ who revealed it to men by living it himself in the days of his flesh, who was vindicated by the spirit he revealed and by his victory over sin and death, who was the marvel of angels, heralded among the nations, accounted worthy of trust in the world and exalted high in heavenly glory. This truth that God through his incarnate, glorified Son offers men salvation from sin and the power unto godly life and character is the heart of the gospel.—The church exists solely to bring this power to men and to help them attain it. The magnitude and importance of her task justifies every effort to make her indeed God's household, the place where men will find and meet God and learn to become like him in Christ.

16. This is believed by many to be part of an early Christian hymn.

CHAPTER IV

1-5. Warning of Dangers. Heroic zeal and unflinching watchfulness are called for in the care of the church. She is and is still to be beset by many dangers. Timothy is reminded of an old "prophecy about a later crisis which is now being fulfilled." The reference is indefinite; many words prophetic of doom or danger, either from the O.T. or from Christian tradition, could be pressed into service here. There is no necessity for limiting this warning to some particular crisis; the references are very general, such as may be anticipated repeatedly; as a matter of fact, Paul had time and again encountered troublous times involving every evil here mentioned and worse. Timothy and every other minister must anticipate the same. Paul knew defection of some converts in Galatia, for instance. False teachers were a constant menace to the N.T. church. Paul was ceaselessly vigilant to curtail their work. He has lately met some of them at Ephesus and knows they are misguided spirits who profess inspiration but teach doctrines that could come only from demons, never from Christ. They dabble in hypocrisy and lies until their consciences are seared and they no longer realize that they are hypocrites and liars. They say, for instance, that the way to please God is to refrain from marriage and to refuse to eat meats. The truth is God himself gave men these gifts. What men need to be taught is how to use them, thankfully and prayerfully, in the spirit of Him who bestowed them, and to fulfill his will.

6-16. Counselling a Good Minister. The counsels here become exceedingly personal. Timothy is a delegate from Paul; first and foremost he is a minister from Jesus Christ. As a good minister, he will keep reminding the brethren of the things of Christ; he will hold Christian ideals before them constantly. The art of repeating, of saying the same thing over and over again from some new angle, of keeping a desired truth before his hearers, of making a proper "time exposure," is an essential part of the good minister's equipment; it is to be most earnestly coveted and sought after. To this end, Timothy is admonished to nourish his own soul with the truth that keeps faith fresh and strong; let him look carefully after his own life; let him diligently continue in that wholesome teaching to which he has been so loyal and let him avoid discussions which often are as foolish and worthless as the tales a grandmother tells the children (v. 7).

The good minister disciplines his own soul and keeps it "fit" by exercising it in the practice of godliness. Bodily discipline, perhaps athletic exercise, but more probably ascetic practices recommended by false teachers, has its profit, but it is the discipline of the soul, the training and exercising of the spirit in the practice of godliness, that enriches all life, both the present and that which is to come. So true is this that to this end, the achievement of godliness, all our labor and effort are devoted; this is the end of all our quest, to find God and become like him. The minister does his finest preaching and teaching by his example, by his own gospel-disciplined life (vv. 7-12).

Even a young man can give a demonstration in this way that will compel respect and make others forget his lack of years. He can be an example of what gospel power and gospel living are. Such teaching cannot be refuted. He is to instruct his people and guide them in their reading. Let him be diligent about his own reading and study. It is refreshing to hear the apostle advise his son to keep up his work as a student, to find time in his busy days for study and reading. 2 Tim. 4:13 intimates that Paul himself had the practice of carrying books around with him and, amid all his pastoral cares, of keeping up his studies.

The teacher, however, does not qualify as a good minister of Jesus Christ until the training of the school in logic, rhetoric, and similar arts, is re-enforced with the matchless power of a life that constantly shows forth the spirit of Jesus in word, in manner of living, in good will and in purity. The gift he is not to neglect is his authority as a recognized official leader to exercise these various functions Paul has mentioned, which was conferred upon him by the elders, who felt they were led of God to choose him and appoint him to such work as they did, when they laid their hands upon him. This laying on of hands (v. 14) was an old custom, without thought of any magical transmission of right or power, a symbol on the part of the elders of their good will and blessing and also of their prayer that God was acting through them. Whether this refers to his appointment and ordination at Lystra (Acts 16:1-3) when first he joined Paul and Silas, or to a recent ordination, we may not say. The trust of the brethren bestowed on him is to be honored and confirmed by the faithful discharge of his duties and steadfast loyalty to his task. Diligent heed both to his example, his own salvation and to his teachings will be rewarded in seeing his hearers saved unto Christian life and living. This is the final evidence that he is a good minister.

CHAPTER V

Handling Special Cases. These cases constitute the theme of ch. 5 and of 6:1, 2. Upon Timothy will also devolve pastoral cares and the administration of discipline. Here follow a number of special cases where the personal preparation spoken of above will be most fortunate and most needed. In the household of the Lord there can be no harsh discrimination, no censoriousness, no vindictiveness or personal bias. If brotherly love, the spirit of Jesus, self-control and purity of motive are ever needed by the church leader, it is when he is called upon to discipline a brother, to decide between brethren or pass judgment upon an offending member. Happy the pastor who is gifted with tact, discretion, and power bestowed of God to sense the values involved and the real issues at stake. His strength will needs be tempered with tenderness and his firmness with the gentleness that seeks but to serve the offender's good.

1, 2. Discipline Adapted to the Offender. Be considerate of a brother well advanced in years, older than yourself; treat him as you would your own father, try exhortation and encouragement before rebuke. Deal with older women and with younger men and women in the same considerate way; the personal element transcends the official; the purpose is to uplift and help, not to mar or brand.

3-16. Widows. It is of the very genius of the gospel to care for the poor and needy.

The first mention recorded in the annals of the church to do this systematically was in the case of widows (Acts 6), and this had fine precedent in the solicitude with which Jewish piety supervised the care of its orphans and widows. (See Edersheim, Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 167.) There is division of opinion whether provision made here was for one class or more than one class. It is quite clearly the duty of any Christian who has a widow in his family connection to provide for her and not allow her to become dependent upon the charity of the church. A refusal to do so proves one worse than an unbeliever. Pagans often evinced a high quality of humanity in their charitable care of their needy ones. Christians cannot do less—particularly if they are to describe the church as a family, God their Father, and other believers their brethren. They must honor that name of brother or change it (v. 8).

There has been no little dispute concerning instructions in regard to the widows who were dependent upon the church. It would be harsh discrimination to refuse aid to any widow under sixty years of age. A rearrangement of the text as follows, vv. 3, 4, 8, 7, 5, 6, 9 (see Parry) simplifies the matter by indicating that an official list was first to be compiled of all dependent widows who were entitled to receive alms from the church; from this list a certain number, all over sixty, were selected for various duties or services for which they received some recognition from the church. The arrangement was somewhat precarious; it was to be guarded most carefully, lest it bring the church into disrepute. The qualifications for candidacy to this class are rather well-defined and severe. The younger widows are advised to remarry (cf. 1 Cor. 7), as though the normal field for a woman's activity is in the home, playing the unrivaled part of wife, mother, and good neighbor.

17-25. To Discipline an Elder, etc. The word elder was used in 5:1 merely in the sense of an older brother; here that meaning scarcely satisfies the context, and the term is better understood as having official significance. Such an official may both preside and teach, and when he renders this double service he is to be regarded by the church as worthy of double honor, esteem, and possibly also larger remuneration or support. This very reasonable advice is verified by two citations referred to as Scripture, one from the O.T. (Deut. 25:4) and the other the words of Jesus (Mt. 10:10 Lk. 10:7). This reference shows how Jesus became supreme authority with his followers; here is evidence how the authority accorded him naturally came to be attached to his words; the church was unconsciously building a new canon (see p. 948b). An accusation against an elder has no hearing unless it is presented scripturally, by two or three witnesses. An elder found guilty deserves public reproof, that others may be restrained from imitating him. Timothy is most impressively admonished to use the greatest discretion in such cases, avoiding all influences that might prejudice his interest or distort his judgment (v. 21).

22. Lay hands hastily on no man, could be an injunction against ordaining any man as an elder hastily, without due deliberation; "carelessness in appointment involves responsibility for sin." In the present connection, however, the more likely interpretation is to construe it as an exhortation not to lay hands in acquittal too readily upon one under trial or not to be too hasty to restore to office one adjudged guilty. Such readiness to overlook guilt may breed guilt. It is a grave offense to palliate sin or treat wrongdoing lightly. An official who lets an offender off too lightly may really embolden him or encourage him to further wrongdoing and so become responsible for this new sin, a partaker in the offender's guilt. Let Timothy be so judicious as to avoid having any share in or responsibility for the sins of others. Paul adds (vv. 24, 25) that some cases for discipline will be easy and almost decide themselves, so evident their merits; in other instances longer and more careful investigation will be necessary before a decision can be rendered. And so it is with works; some are obviously worthy; others, though not so obvious, will eventually reveal their true character.

23. This verse has often been seriously abused. It is hard to fit it into the discussion, unless it may be that with this thought of avoiding responsibility for sins of others Timothy had refrained from all use of wine, and Paul, knowing his friend's physical condition, indigestion or weak stomach, advised a sparing use of wine as a medical remedy.

CHAPTER VI

1, 2. Advice for Christian Slaves. (Continuing the "special cases" discussed in ch. 5.) Believers who are slaves of pagan masters are enjoined to show respect to those masters and render them good service; poor service will reproach them and the God they confess. Those in service to Christian masters or employers are not to presume upon the fact of Christian brotherhood; rather let them serve all the more diligently because the master who receives the benefits of their service is a believer and beloved.

3-10. Godliness and Gain. The apostle resumes his warnings against the teacher of unsound doctrines. The unwholesomeness of the teachings of one such manifests itself in his own character, in his egotism, presumption, tiresome wranglings, suspicion, and low thinking. His teaching makes him utterly unloving and unlovable. He reveals his mercenary spirit and wrong motive by his constant talk about profit. He would give one the idea that he is godly simply as a matter of good and gainful business. There is great gain in godliness, though not the kind he prates about. According to Paul, gain consists of material wealth, while the gain that godliness brings lies in the enrichment of personality, in the content and possession of spirit that only those can have who are at peace, on good terms with God. Religion does not neglect normal physical needs and a rightful provision for the same, but it does apply a very ugly name to the man who thinks that the end of life is building bigger barns; for we came into the world without things and without things pass we into the next world. Jesus talked much about the danger of riches. When the desire of the heart is to become rich, to possess many things, the needs of the higher life are apt to be crowded out and forgotten. Root of all evil is this covetousness after money, after possessions, as can be all too freely illustrated by those who, in going in search of riches, lose the way to life, to abiding contentment and to God.

11-16. Lay Hold on Eternal Life. Paul has drawn many shafts of criticism for writing Timothy as he does in this paragraph, exhorting him to fight the good fight of faith, to avoid the temptations of riches, to keep his eye and heart on eternal values and strive persistently to attain them. Why not an exhortation like this even to Timothy? When does the leader or any other Christian become immune to danger from the desire for things and other temptations just as ordinary? The apostle confesses "I have not attained; I press on" (Phil. 3¹³). Let Timothy flee all that is false, loyally remembering his call to be God's man and the good start he made before many witnesses. It is still his charge to maintain faith with God and Jesus Christ in fulfilling the trust committed to him, the attainment of eternal life for himself and others, even until the day when Christ shall come again in honor and power eternal.

17-19. The Rightful Use of Riches. This paragraph concerning riches and their proper employment seems quite awkward and is apparently misplaced. Those who have riches suffer temptation to trust in what they have rather than in God. There is an echo here of the words of Jesus admonishing that those who would be wise lay up their treasures in heaven by investing in his work here and now.

20, 21. Entreaty to Guard the Treasure. The apostle's closing word to his son

Timothy is an entreaty, voicing the desire of his heart, that he guard as the treasure of his life the opportunity given him to serve the Church of Jesus Christ, whose minister he is and whose grace is with him.

SECOND TIMOTHY

INTRODUCTION

For the general introduction see the discussion preceding 1 Timothy.

The Deep Personal Note of the Letter. Paul is a prisoner in the city of Rome and is alone save for his beloved physician Luke. He speaks touchingly of the attention he received from an Ephesian friend, Onesiphorus, who sought him out apparently with difficulty and ministered unto him. His conditions are such as to leave no doubt as to his fate; the letter is dominated by the thought that his end is near and his campaigning closed. (See p. 1275; cf. p. 942.) He summons Timothy in the hope that they may have a farewell visit together before the end. The letter contributes but little doctrinally or ecclesiastically. It is the most favorably estimated of the Pastorals; many critics who do not receive the whole as genuine find authentic Pauline sections in it. It is intensely personal, not in the sense that it was written to Timothy alone but in view of the note of close friendship and paternal concern. It is almost like a father writing a son to bequeath him his business, the great interests of his life. How natural under the circumstance for memory to flood in as he writes, with thought of their days together and of the experiences that have bound them with the ties of deep affection and with passion for a common cause! There is fine spiritual value in listening while the old apostle, filled with years and labors devoted to the Lord whom he adores, commits his work to the younger man and sketches for him the kind of leader he would have him be; and there is high inspiration also in learning with what spirit of trust and fearlessness this follower of Christ faces the crossing of the bar. He hopes to see his Pilot face to face.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. To Timothy the Beloved. Whatever other distinction Paul may have been able to claim, the one for which he counted all others as loss was the privilege of knowing himself called and sent of God to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ. To Timothy he was the representative of Christ who had claimed his devoted allegiance and affection through many a year of service. Paul struck the keynote of the letter when he greeted Timothy as his beloved child.

3-14. Thanksgiving for Timothy. The lines here are very personal and winsomely frank. The heart and the mind both speak; memory and emotion mingle and blend with instruction and encouragement until in the rush of suggestions one may find oneself confused. Paul thanks the God of his fathers whom he serves with a clear conscience for Timothy, for his past life, his character, his friendship, his service; mentions him regularly in his prayers by day and by night, and longs eagerly to see him once more as he recalls the tears the tender-hearted Timothy shed at their parting. It may be Timothy was apprehensive for his beloved apostle; parting was a serious matter for the campaigners in those days.

Some readers find a hint in v. 5 that Paul has had a late reminder of his friend's devotion, a letter, a gift, or some other token which reminded him anew of Timothy's sincere and unreserved loyalty to the faith, that faith which both his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice owned, loved, and bequeathed to him as a precious heritage. It is great joy to the apostle to remember how the faith came to this household; how those good women accepted it so wholeheartedly and earnestly that, when the young son of the home, their fond hope, confessed the Christ and would go out in his service they hesitated not, but offered him willingly, that Paul might lay his hands upon him to consecrate him to the task.

The apostle, however, does not lose himself in memory; he appeals to Timothy to stir up, "to keep at white heat," that gift of grace, that endowment of the spirit, which God bestowed upon him when the apostle consecrated him for service (v. 6). That gift included no fearfulness, no cowardice, no reluctance to suffer or endure, but strength to serve, power to care for others and a spirit to discipline and train himself for his ministry. Let him never be ashamed of his faith that he is a Christian nor of his friend who is in prison for the faith, but let him, like his friend, be ready to suffer shame and share any hardship that must be incurred in preaching the gospel. Strength for this God will supply, and an earnest of this we have already had in the power with which he saved us and called us to holiness of life and service. For we were neither saved nor called by reason of our merits or our strength but by virtue of that saving purpose and generous grace of God which, though true of him from all eternity, has been but lately fully manifested in the coming of Jesus, who had power to release us from our fear of death and make us sure of life and immortality (vv. 9, 10). The writer of that is a prisoner facing death! Paul was called to spread this gospel throughout the world and it is because he has done so he is now in prison. For all that he is not ashamed, neither has he any doubt about his gospel; he knows Him whom the gospel has taught him to trust and is peacefully confident that he has power to honor and fulfill the gospel's every promise even unto death.

12c. Parry translates to read "he is able to help me maintain my trust, to be true to the gospel intrusted to me until the day when I shall have completed my work." The apostle is convinced that he knows Jesus Christ; that is the dynamic secret of his ministry; his whole Christian life has been built on the conviction that he has not been alone; that Jesus has been with him; his passion has been not so much devotion to a cause as to a great personality. Jesus was an abiding reality.

13. Timothy is earnestly entreated to hold in the same way to the gospel, to that type or pattern of wholesome teaching which Paul has told him was the truth of Christ; he is to hold it with firm faith and love that can be known only in union with Christ. This precious gospel has been committed to Timothy and he is to guard it with the help of God's Spirit which dwells in men.

15-18. One Who Was Not Ashamed. The appeal to Timothy not to be ashamed of his friend in bonds is not mere sentiment. Paul refers to an experience when, either in Asia or in Rome, he needed friends, and some of his friends from Asia who were at hand were ashamed of his bonds and forsook him. On the other hand, the good Onesiphorus had been generously loyal; when he came to Rome he diligently sought out Paul and ministered unto him. It is inferred by many that Onesiphorus had since died and Paul's benediction is accordingly cited as proof that he sanctioned prayers for the dead. Both are inferences only, and are equally precarious.

CHAPTER II

1-13. A Good Fellow Soldier. The old campaigner for the gospel, convinced his

campaigning days are over, appeals to Timothy to see to it that the campaigning shall not cease. He is to recruit and train helpers who will pass on the things learned from Paul and proved in so many testing experiences. Any good soldier will suffer hardship for his cause! The service of Christ calls for the same kind of fidelity and rigorous devotion which prompts a soldier to free himself from all distracting interests and give himself with undivided zeal to the leader whose approval he seeks, which prompts an athlete to keep himself in training and to keep all the hard rules of the game, that he may win his laurel, or a gardener to toil slavishly, that he may reap a harvest (vv. 4-6). Every worthy end demands its toll in labor, hardship, devotion, and loyalty. The Lord enable thee to see how the tremendous responsibility of taking the gospel of Christ to others justifies every hardship and all devotion! This is increasingly clear to one who keeps thinking about Jesus Christ, of David's royal line, raised from the dead, according to that gospel for which Paul has been imprisoned like a common criminal; but stopping him or binding him will not stop or bind the gospel; that must go on (v. 9). He endures everything gladly, that he may aid others, all God's chosen ones, to share the saving power and fellowship of Jesus Christ. It is a faithful word that promises rich reward for all we suffer or endure. In suffering or dying for the gospel we suffer and die with Christ, and he will see to it that our reward is sure.

14-26. The Workman Approved. Paul proceeds in this paragraph to give Timothy further counsel as to how he may become the kind of workman that God will approve. He begins with advice about training others who are to become Christian teachers; the great central truths of the gospel are to be kept clearly before them while they are warned against mere word-wars, against contentious preaching which antagonizes the hearers and neither wins nor profits converts (v. 16). Then he changes to direct appeal and urges Timothy to win God's approval by living the truth, and exemplifying his words. Let him give exposition of the gospel both in his teaching and in his character so true to the spirit of Christ that his work may never cause God to blush. The babblings decried in v. 16 are empty, irreligious discussions always current, which distract attention from the true issues of godliness, break down the spiritual life and in their demoralizing activity spread like cancer. An illustration of this is the case of Hymenæus and Philetus, who by their hapless speculations about the resurrection already being past, got away from the truth and unsettled some in the faith. Despite all such foolish teachers, God's truth stands firm, and the true teacher of his truth must pass two tests: first, he must in some way show that God is with him—The Lord knoweth his own—and, second, his life must correspond to his teaching—Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness. As in any household there are many kinds of vessels and furnishings, of varied value, rank, honor, and grades of service, so in the church, the household of God, the members are vessels to be used of the Master, some for higher, some for humbler service. Let the teacher keep himself clean and free from the contaminations of the false teachers so that he may be a vessel of honorable rank, set apart, fitted and equipped for good work in his Master's service (vv. 20, 21). That Timothy may be such a vessel of honor, let him flee every sin, great or small, which unfits a man, young or old, for Christian service; let him pursue the virtues that mark Christian character and keep company with others of like pursuit who will aid him in attaining the same.

Again, he is cautioned against taking part in senseless debates, aimless discussions whose only outcome will be strife, bad temper, and hostility (v. 23). Men are never shown the error of their way and won to righteousness by such means. The Lord's servant will, like his Lord, be patient with those who err, hoping with more courteous, tolerant, tactful methods to disarm opposition and lead to repentance and a knowledge of the truth that shall mean their escape from evil and their saving. So will he show himself approved of God.

CHAPTER III

1-17. Equipped for Crisis. This chapter, like the preceding, deals with the task of equipping Timothy for the work which is to devolve upon him as he takes over the leadership which Paul realizes he has already laid down. To impress upon him more strenuously the need of the qualifications advised, undivided devotion to Christ, loyalty to gospel truth, courage to suffer for the cause and consistent Christian character, he is warned that the worst has not yet passed. The last days may describe the days preceding the Lord's return, but there is no need so to limit them; they are really quite general and have been fulfilled over and over again, days "when the patience of the Lord will be tried to the uttermost and his servants will find the times hard." The picture (vv. 1-8) is revolting; sin will run rampant; religion will be perverted; men will maintain a show of godliness but know nothing of religion as a power that turns them from sin and makes them new men in Christ; there will be those who will win their way into homes and impose upon sin-laden souls who cannot discern the truth. As Moses had his Jannes and Jambres, men who tried to discredit him and to compete for his leadership, so may the Christian leader expect similar opponents, conscienceless reprobates, who also must be exposed and restrained, as they will be when their true character is shown. How shall Timothy equip himself to meet and deal with such situations? Let him follow and maintain the training he has had under Paul, what he has learned from him, his teaching, his conduct, his faithfulness, his readiness to suffer and endure (v. 14). For Paul took it for granted that every follower of Christ can count on suffering for the cause; it was part of the program; yet out of all these hardships Paul was delivered; i.e., God was with him to enable him to endure them and remain faithful. Even if things should get worse and more critical situations arise, Timothy will still prove steadfast, remembering what he has learned and who his teachers have been, namely, those Scriptures which he learned even as a babe and which when interpreted in the light of Christ are able to make one wise unto salvation. So personal Christian experience, training under Christian leaders such as he has had under Paul, and a wise use of the sacred writings will prove sufficient equipment with which to meet great difficulties and strong opponents.

8. The two men named here are otherwise unknown. There may have been an apocryphal book which told about them (so Origen); or a purely oral tradition. Some suggest the reference may be to Ex. 7¹¹.

16. These sacred writings, scriptures inspired of God, i.e., breathing the spirit and character of God (see art., The Divine Element in the Bible, pp. 26-31), are an instrument of great power, whether for discipline, for instruction in the right way of living, for revealing the mind of God, wherewith the man of God, the teacher, apostle, preacher may be completely and thoroughly equipped for service. A comparison of translations by various authors of vv. 16, 17 will show at once the uselessness of being dogmatic about an exact translation. A better approach will be to recall Paul's attitude toward and use of his O.T., which, of course, "scriptures" here means. Now, Paul undoubtedly believed firmly that the Scriptures were given of God and very valuable to the Christian. However, he did not find salvation in or through the O.T., as is evidenced by his own repeated confession in the letters. The O.T. had permanent value for him only as he learned to find in it confirmation for his experience in and interpretation of Christ. (See art., Formation of N.T., p. 853, for early Christian use of O.T.). His authority was Christ, and for him the authority of Christ superseded that of the O.T. and all else besides. Perhaps he is intimating here that the best test for writing that is to be called sacred is its inherent power to inspire and equip a man for Christian life and service.

CHAPTER IV

r-8. The Campaigner Closes His Work.

With the earnestness of a man who is looking at things as though he were standing in the presence of God and the eternal Judge, the old apostle once more charges Timothy to be incessant, tireless in his labors to spread the gospel and fulfill the many duties involved in ministering to the churches. The times will test him; the days will come when men will be impatient of the real teachings of the gospel; its ideals will seem too high and exacting and men will want an easier way (v. 3). Against such times let Timothy be prepared to keep his balance, to face hardship and to work uncompromisingly as an evangelist should unto whom have been committed the interests of Jesus and his gospel in the lives of men. Now comes a statement accounting for all the eager pleading of the whole letter. The apostle's urgency and anxiety to have Timothy be a good minister, a workman approved, is explained in the old campaigner's word that his days are numbered, his ministry in behalf of the churches and the beloved gospel has closed. All through the lines he has been committing his work to his son in the faith, challenging the younger man to take up the torch he flings him and carry on for Christ. In words of rarest beauty and the greatest spiritual charm, he goes on to speak of his present situation and the outlook for to-morrow—a veritable swan song. His life-blood is about to be poured out and he thinks of it as an offering to God (v. 6). He has long been on campaign for his Lord, now he awaits orders for the last march. With all its hardships, his service with Christ has been a glorious struggle and brings no regrets; he has kept faith with his Lord and is perfectly confident that his Lord will keep faith with him; there is for him laurel greater than victor-athlete ever won, a crown of life itself which the Lord in the days when conflict is over will confer on every faithful campaigner for his cause. He is not alone; the Christ who has dwelt in him (Gal. 2²⁰) is present now; not even death can separate him from the love of God in Christ Jesus.

9-22. Last Instructions. His message to Timothy, his challenge and charge, are finished; ere he closes, Paul adds a few bits of personal information and instruction, asking Timothy to find Mark and come to him, bringing with him certain reading matter and a cloak from Troas. Warning is given about one Alexander who is hostile to the cause. Paul's severity toward him is more likely to have a moral rather than a merely personal or doctrinal basis. See on anathema, Gal. 16-9. It was an injury to the cause of Christ that aroused Paul. The allusion to Mark (v. 11) is interesting. It shows that whatever misunderstanding there may have been over his "defection" (Acts 12:12, 25 13:13 15:37-40) was now past.

16-18. The reference here to a first defense, when the apostle was deserted by all who should have stood by him, is very indefinite. The usual supposition is that it is out of place. The reference may be to a preliminary trial, or to his trial at the close of the first imprisonment, or to some other experience unknown to us. On the one hand, he seems to be telling us that he was delivered from the first trial so as to go on with his preaching, and he expresses the hope that the Lord is to grant him a similar deliverance now; yet, on the other hand, he has just written (vv. 7, 8) his conviction that his work is finished. Perhaps we should say that Paul remains hopeful in the face of a hopeless outlook.

The mention of so many names here shows how wide was Paul's acquaintance, and their connection with so many different places shows how intimately he knew the life of the church. Some of the persons mentioned are otherwise quite unknown to us, a fact suggestive of the extent to which the work of the church depends upon the quiet fidelity of obscure people. There has been many a faithful soul whose record, like that of Paul's unknown friends, is written only in heaven.

TITUS

INTRODUCTION

Titus the Man; Reasons for the Letter. (For a fuller discussion see intro. to Pastoral Epistles, p. 1274.) The time when Paul had been in Crete to found the churches there and to leave Titus in charge of them is a matter of conjecture: we have suggested (see p. 1275a) some time during his release from the first imprisonment. The work has prospered and requires more careful organization and supervision. Our information about Titus is limited. Tradition has it that he was a Gentile convert of Paul. No mention is made of him in Acts. He first appears when Paul took him as a test case in the question of circumcising Gentile believers (Gal. 23); later he was Paul's delegate to consider misunderstandings between the apostle and the church at Corinth; evidently, Paul regarded him as very capable and trustworthy—a genuine son in the faith. The personal bond between them was not, however, so close as that between Paul and Timothy. This letter savors much more of the official than the letters to Timothy. The lack of the personal in Titus is decidedly noticeable in comparison, though the few personal references that do appear are suggestive of high regard and confidence as though Titus were older, more efficient, and a stronger personality than Timothy. One feels that there was less need for personal guidance and advice in his case than with the younger and more timid Timothy. As to how Paul came to write and from what point we can only guess; with him at the time were Artemas, Tychicus, Zenas and Apollos, who were to visit Titus, and who may have carried the letter. The advices and instructions are very similar to those in 1 Timothy. They are written to aid, guide, and encourage Titus in his endeavor to raise the Cretan converts from their low current standards to the higher levels of Christian living. In doing this much will depend upon careful selection and training of leaders and rightful discipline. Hence the attention in the letter to such matters.

CHAPTER I

1-4. Greeting. This is unusually long. Paul explains that he is writing as one who has been called into the service of God and of Jesus Christ and has come to know what real godliness is. The godliness he knows holds the promise of eternal life, which God who cannot lie promised long ages ago, and has now confirmed and proclaimed in the gospel. This gospel God had commanded him to publish. He feels he can write Titus as to a son, since he too knows this wondrous faith in which they share the peace and grace God only can bestow in Jesus Christ.

5-9. Concerning Officials. In setting things in order in the Cretan congregations, as he has been left there to do, Titus will find it necessary to give attention to matters of organization and to provide proper officials to assist in the supervision and conduct of the work. In every place elders must be appointed, men whose personal qualifications will justify their appointment to leadership, against whom no charge can be sustained, free from polygamy, training their families in the Christian faith, whose conduct is a credit to the church. Likewise in every place a bishop, or overseer, must be sought out and placed in charge. (For discussion of officers, their duties, order and relation, see pp. 1276-8, and also notes on 1 Tim. 3.) Even very ordinary judgment would dictate that these appointees should possess the gifts and graces necessary to the duties of their office. But Paul's emphasis is upon their moral and spiritual fitness. Let them be men who subscribe to the gospel both in doctrine and in practice, who exercise such graces as tolerance and self-control, who do not resort to violence, nor serve God for gold, but whose lives are above reproach, who are hospitable, who make religion attractive, who sanely put emphasis upon things truly essential to the faith. Such men have double power when they preach the gospel, either to win converts or to withstand opposition; they have the power inherent in wholesome truth and the power that comes from truth exemplified in consistent Christian living.

10-16. Silencing the Disturbers. Among the many things that call for officials who can properly guide and guard the interests of the church is the case of certain members of questionable and unruly character, who are assuming leadership and seriously troubling and interfering with the churches. They are, in part at least, Jewish converts cleverly dispensing erroneous ideas that unsettle the faith of entire Christian families. For the sake of money they are indulging in discussion that propriety forbids and saying things that will demoralize the crowd they may attract. (See discussion on p. 1264a.) They must be summarily dealt with, officially silenced. Current standards of morals and decency were proverbially low among the Cretans, whom one of their own poets caustically and truthfully described as "liars always." What the Cretans need is not encouragement in their natural disposition, but help in raising their standards to Christian levels. Titus is a man of action, an able disciplinarian, and Paul advises him to call the trouble makers to a sharp halt (v. 13) and make an end of their pratings about Jewish fables and perverted distinctions about defilement, about what is clean and unclean. Such distinctions create false ideas, for defilement, cleanness and uncleanness, is a matter of the inward man. To the pure in mind and heart all things are pure; to the defiled heart and mind nothing is pure; no ceremonial can cleanse the sources of action. Professing to know God, these false leaders show by the lives they live that it is impossible for them to be regarded as acquainted with God. God could not fellowship with their unholy conduct.

CHAPTER II

1-15. Applying the Wholesome Gospel. The proper correction for this unsettling and demoralizing work of the unprincipled or misguided teachers in Crete will be a clean, clear-cut, honest setting forth of the health-giving ideals and the power-giving spirit of the gospel. Let the gospel be applied among the Cretans. Let all classes practice it, the aged and the young, both men and women, and even those who are but bondservants of others. Let the older men see what the gospel can do toward making them steadfast, sober, tolerant, friendly, and patient under hardship or persecution; Christ has power to make old age beautiful. Likewise the older women should learn the sane manners and practice the simple graces inculcated by the spirit of the gospel. Nothing makes a woman quite so beautiful as simple goodness. And the older Cretan mothers will do well to pass this word on to their younger sisters in the faith, training them to be faithful and loyal to husband, home, and children; chaste, wholesome, an honor to God. And the younger men can do their part in this work of applying the gospel. Think of charging young men to make religion respectable! Titus is to live a Christian life before them, an example in good works and Christian manhood. The finest way to answer, silence and disarm a scoffer or opponent is to live a better and a more blameless life and show a higher quality of spirit. How clear it is to the apostle, and how persistently he keeps it before others, that the gospel is come to bring life and make new in Christ! Even slaves and servants may adorn the doctrine of their Lord by an honorable and trustworthy discharge of duties and a courteous attitude toward their masters. Let it be said that if you want a good, honest servant or workman get a Christian!

This insistence upon applied Christianity is the only true way to teach the gospel. It is entirely practicable, for the gospel promises the grace of God to help men obey its teachings. Christianity bestows the power of fulfilling its own ideal. The gospel is a school for character, instructing men to renounce all impiety, to curb all lustful impulses and to learn the discipline of self-control and the beauty of righteousness; it is also a training place where men acquire the strength and power to fulfill these instructions in this present world. And it inspires with the hope that some day we may see at closer range that great saving Friend who has made all this possible, who was so interested in us that he invested himself, with all his life and power, in the great endeavor to save us from sinful selfish living and make us people like himself, peculiar in our devotion to good works and beautiful living. Titus has the task to set and hold these ideals before the Cretans and to have no tolerance with any who would allow that being a Christian can mean anything less than a living likeness unto Christ.

CHAPTER III

1-11. Maintaining Christian Attitudes. Paul exhorts the Cretan believers to be law-abiding, loyal citizens, ready to support every good cause and deserving the respect and protection of the authorities. Let them also show their appreciation of what God has done for them by the attitude they maintain toward others, particularly outsiders; for time was when all of us, believers now, were living much as these unbelievers are. But when God came with saving power into our lives, not by reason of our merit but purely because of his great grace, we were made like new men by the power of God's Holy Spirit; our lives were cleansed, and we were given the promise of eternal life. Surely, it is incumbent upon those who have received such wondrous favor to maintain that attitude which will be helpful and profitable unto the saving of others, to practice good works, and to refuse part in any activity that is not animated by the Spirit of Christ. Any convert who is persistently factious and refuses to conform to plain Christian standards cannot be "regarded as a colleague or a friend"; his own actions classify and condemn him.

The kindness (v. 4) of God means his grace, and in the Scriptures the grace of God means the undeserved favor with which he regards mankind. Our salvation has its real ground in that favor. Regeneration and renewing (v. 5) are not acts of man but acts of God. We are saved, not by what we do—works of righteousness—but by something that is done for us—poured out upon us richly (v. 6). There is danger, however, that the meaning of this shall be misunderstood: hence the exhortation to honesty and goodness of life (v. 8). This is characteristic Pauline teaching, such as we have in both Romans and Galatians. A factious man (v. 10) is one who would divide the church over such unimportant questions as those mentioned in v. 9.

12-15. Conclusion. Paul is considerate of Titus, and would provide for his being temporarily relieved of his responsibilities. Concern for his subordinates is a true sign of greatness in a leader. A similar interest is shown in Zenas and Apollos as they travel: Titus is to see to their wants. Whether this is the Apollos of Acts 18^{24f.} and 1 Cor. 3⁶ we cannot say, but it is not unlikely.

14. This verse suggests that the inherent Cretan idleness (1¹²) still needed to be watched: even with divine help it is no easy matter to destroy deep-seated habit.

PHILEMON

BY PROFESSOR C. H. DODD

INTRODUCTION

Character of the Epistle. The Epistle to Philemon is a simple letter to a friend on a personal matter, with no doctrinal or ecclesiastical purpose. In language and form it resembles the typical private correspondence of the period, of which we possess numerous examples among Egyptian papyri.

Reason for the Epistle. The circumstances can be gathered from the letter itself. Philemon was a well-to-do resident at Colossæ. At some period (probably during the apostle's residence at Ephesus) he had come under the influence of Paul, and been converted to Christianity (v. 19). He became a leading and active member of the church at Colossæ. Some time afterward one of his slaves, Onesimus, ran away. He was not, like some members of the household of Philemon, a Christian. The runaway somehow or other came into touch with Paul, then in prison. It is idle to speculate what led to the meeting. Under Paul's influence he became a Christian, and made himself so useful to the prisoner that he would have liked to retain him in his service. Mindful, however, of Philemon's rights, and unwilling to presume on friendship, he sent Onesimus back, bearing the letter which we have before us, in which he requests the master, on the highest Christian grounds, to take back and forgive his erring slave, undertaking at the same time to indemnify him out of his own pocket for any pecuniary loss he may have suffered (vv. 18, 19).

It was a good deal to ask of an injured master under the conditions of the time, but Paul believes that the Christian sentiments of Philemon, particularly toward one who is now a fellow Christian, will override the natural resentment and class feeling of the employer and lead him to regard Onesimus in a wholly new relation. This is all that he expressly asks. He does not request Onesimus' emancipation; but, on the other hand, he does hint (v. 14) that if it were to occur to Philemon to send Onesimus back to him, it would be greatly appreciated. Philemon would doubtless like to be of use to his friend. He cannot be with him in prison; perhaps he would like Onesimus to act as his deputy.

An Expression of a Christian Principle. Such is the purport of the letter. Its chief interest is in the light it throws on Paul himself at a moment when he is neither the preacher, the controversialist, the theologian, nor the ecclesiastical authority, but simply a man writing to a friend in the interests of another friend. It has sometimes been quite wrongly treated as a tract on slavery. It is hardly necessary to point out that no question of principle regarding that institution is even raised. What Paul had to say on slavery in theory is to be found in Colossians (see 322-41 and notes), and even there he does not raise the question whether or no the institution as such should or should not exist. In the present letter he simply accepts the situation in which the law and custom of the time had placed Philemon and Onesimus, and asks what, in that situation, is the Christian duty of Philemon. His answer is in effect that the relation between them is to be wholly ruled by the Christian principle of love or charity. All that he says is steeped in obviously genuine affection for the runaway, and he expects that the Christian master will treat the slave as a "brother beloved" (vv. 12, 15, 16). What will ultimately become of slavery on that basis he does not stop to ask. But it is worth while to observe that it was at this point that Christianity first tackled the matter, and not by way of any theorizing about the "rights of man."

A Historical Contrast. The actual situation in which Paul, Philemon, and Onesimus stood at the moment when the runaway met the apostle may be illustrated from a document published in the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, Vol. 14 (1920), No. 1643 (dated 298 A.D.). Here one Aurelius Sarapammon writes to a friend, whose name has perished, as follows: "I commission you by this writ to journey to the famous city of Alexandria and search for my slave, by name . . . , about 35 years old, known to you. When you have found him you shall place him in custody, with authority to shut him up and whip him, and to lay a complaint before the proper authorities against any persons who have harbored him, with a demand for satisfaction."

See further the introductions to Ephesians and Colossians.

Literature: Oesterley, Philemon (Expositor's Greek Testament); Vincent, Philippians and Philemon (International Critical Commentary); and literature under Ephesians and Colossians.

THE EPISTLE

1-3. Epistolary Address. It is a little surprising to find Timothy's name at the head of a purely private letter; no doubt there were good reasons of which we can know nothing. With Philemon as recipient are associated Apphia, whom we may confidently assume to have been his wife, and Archippus, possibly a brother or son, but in any case doubtless a leading member of the church in his house. That phrase probably meant originally the Christian members of the familia (the family, slaves, and dependents; cf. Acts 16¹⁵, 33 18⁸ 1 Cor. 11⁶ 71⁴ 16¹⁵ 2 Tim. 4¹⁹); but at a very early date Christian "brothers" who met for worship and fellowship at the house of a wealthy fellow-Christian were regarded as members of his household and so of the ecclesia (church or congregation) which that household constituted from a religious point of view (cf. Col. 4¹⁵ 1 Cor. 16¹⁹ Rom. 16⁵). Early Christianity was a family affair to an extent not always realized.

4-6. Thanksgiving and Intercession. Paraphrase: "I thank God, in all my prayers, for your Christian life of faith and love, displayed both toward Christ our Lord and toward all Christians, and pray that the faith which you hold in common with us all may work out in a clear intuition of every good thing that brings us into union with Christ. I was especially glad to hear of the act of Christian charity by which you have [recently] brought such contentment to your fellow-Christians."

4. Thanksgiving and intercession belong to the epistolary convention of the time. Paul, however, regularly gives to it a more than conventional significance (see Eph. 13-14, note 115, 16).—Love and faith here as in Col. 14, 5 (where see note) stand for the Christian life in its integrity, as religious and ethical both. Paul passes, with some obscurity of expression, but without any real obscurity of sense, from thanksgiving to petition, the purport of which is much the same as in Col. 19, though more succinctly expressed.

7. Paul has a special ground for thanksgiving. The reference must be to some particular manifestation of love or charity on Philemon's part. Paul was quick to mark, and tenacious in remembering, such acts of grace (cf. 2 Tim. 115-18).

8-21. A Request on Behalf of Onesimus. Paraphrase: "Because I know you are such a good Christian I will not tell you what your duty is in the matter I am about to mention—though I might have done so without presumption—but I will make a request for your charity's sake. It is a request of Paul, Christ's ambassador and prisoner. My request is on behalf of a son of mine, born while I was in prison—Onesimus. A worthless fellow, you say! Yes, once worthless to you, but now of much worth to you and me. I am sending him back to you, and it is as if I sent my own heart. I should have liked to keep him here to do me the service you would have wished to do me in my imprisonment for the gospel. But I would not do so without your consent, that any kindness you show me may be of your own free will. I think the reason why [in God's Providence] he was separated from you for a time was that he might come back as something more than a slave—a dear brother—dear to me, surely dearer to you, with whom he has both earthly and spiritual ties. If, therefore, you think of me as a comrade, welcome him as you would welcome me. If he has done you any wrong, or if he is in your debt, put it to my account. I will make it good. This is a formal undertaking, and I sign it with my own hand—Paul.—Not to mention the fact that you owe all that you are to me!—My dear friend, do me this satisfaction; content my heart 'in Christ.' I write in the certainty that you will do even more than I ask."

9. There is a difficulty about the word rendered the aged (in mg. an ambassador). Properly there is no doubt that the Greek word presbutes means "an old man." Though Paul can scarcely have passed sixty or so, he may have been feeling very old. But the word is easily confused with another word, differing from it by one letter, presbeutes, and meaning "ambassador." It is noteworthy that this confusion does actually occur several times in the Greek O.T. (which was Paul's Bible). Now in Eph. 620 we have the verb presbeuo in the expression, "I am an ambassador in bonds." If Paul wrote Ephesians, this would seem to settle the meaning here. If he did not, then the disciple who wrote Ephesians in his name (see p. 1223) must have understood the Philemon passage to mean "an ambassador and prisoner of Jesus Christ." In any case this is the more probable meaning, whether Paul misspelled the word, or whether the error arose in MS. transmission. He will not command Philemon, on his apostolic authority, but in making his request he will remind his correspondent that it is the request of one who being dedicated to Christ's service makes no such request lightly, and may claim the more deference because he is in a position of impotence—which increases his moral authority in the eyes of any Christian.

11. The words rendered profitable and unprofitable suggest by sense though not by sound the etymological meaning of the name "Onesimus." Paul may have intended the play upon words. But the epithet "unprofitable" is probably chosen as the one which would be at once suggested to Philemon by the name Onesimus, "the wastrel!"

16. There is no formal request that Onesimus shall be emancipated, nor is it clear that Paul contemplated that in becoming a brother beloved (read a dear brother) he would cease to have the legal status of a slave. Rather he would appear to imply that the original relation of master and slave provided a basis, in an intimate relation in the flesh, for a still more intimate relation in the Lord.

18, 19. Paul offers to guarantee Philemon against any loss incurred through Onesimus. To give his guarantee legal validity he signs it in proper form. At the same time he would obviously have been bitterly disappointed if Philemon had accepted this offer from the man who had brought him to Christ.

20. Paul repeats the expression he had used in v. 7 about Philemon's service to the church. Let him show himself again the man he was! The word translated let me have joy of thee is actually the verb from which the name "Onesimus" is derived; Paul was hardly unconscious of the word-play (cf. v. 11). In the Lord, in Christ, are the distinctively Pauline terms for the central Christian experience of a "mystical" union with Christ (see Eph. 13, note). Here they indicate that the service Paul is asking from Philemon is something which falls within the sphere of the common religious life whose characteristic manifestation is love or charity.

21. Paul feels confident that Philemon will do as he asks—and not only this, but something beyond—surely meaning that he will take the hint of v. 14 and send Onesimus back to make himself useful to Paul in prison.

22-25. Paul Closes in His Usual Way, with Personal Matters, Greetings, and Benediction. This is no doubt one item in the news that Tychicus was to tell to the church (Col. 47). Paul expects shortly to be set at liberty—on what grounds we cannot say. If the letter is from Rome, then evidently things looked definitely brighter than when he wrote to Philippi (cf. Phil. 120, 30 217). He means to use the opportunity of his expected release to visit Colossæ. Whether the release and the journey ever took place is one of the unsolved problems of N.T. history. (See art., Life and Work of Paul, p. 942b, and cf. intro. to Pastoral Epistles, p. 1275.)

23. Greetings from the same group of friends as in Colossians, except Jesus Justus.

HEBREWS

BY PROFESSOR H. T. ANDREWS

INTRODUCTION

To understand a N.T. epistle we must first of all seek to discover the circumstances under which it was written and the purpose the author had in view.

Occasion of the Epistle. There is no difficulty in discovering the occasion which led to the writing of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It was composed during one of the great persecutions—probably the Domitianic. The writer describes it as a “word of exhortation” (13²²). It was intended to encourage and inspire the Christians to meet the challenge of the enemy with fortitude and heroism. They had “endured a great conflict of sufferings.” They had been held up to public scorn. Reproaches and taunts had been heaped upon their heads. Many of them had been imprisoned. Others had their property confiscated. They were ostracized from society. They were not allowed, as we are told in the book of Revelation (18¹¹), to buy or sell in the market places. Every effort was taken to make the boycott as complete as possible. A systematic attempt was being made to establish Cæsar worship on an extensive scale—and the clash between Christianity and Cæsar worship entailed untold sufferings upon the followers of Christ. To profess the Christian faith meant the risk of martyrdom and the certainty of petty persecution in the ordinary vocations of life. The First Epistle of Peter describes the sufferings of the church as a fiery trial sent to test the faith (4¹²). Under the strangle hold of persecution, the strain upon the loyalty of the members of the Christian Church became well-nigh intolerable, and it is not surprising that large numbers of men and women were tempted to renounce the faith.

The supreme peril of the church under the stress of persecution was the peril of relapse, and the primary object of the Epistle to the Hebrews is to face this peril and stem the tide of desertion. There is hardly a chapter in the Epistle which does not contain an appeal or a warning to those whose faith was faltering. The writer continually points to the sufferings of Christ as an example to be followed and urges his fellow Christians to be steadfast, that they too may be perfected through suffering. Even Jesus had to learn obedience “by the things which he suffered,” and his followers must be scholars in the same stern school. Suffering is always hard and cruel, but out of its soil there springs up the harvest of righteousness. Nor does the writer hesitate to warn his readers in the harshest terms about the danger that comes from the compromise of faith. The faith once lost can never be regained. If we part with our birth-right, it can never be restored to us. It is impossible to renew unto repentance those who crucify the Son of God afresh (6⁶). “If we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment” (10²⁶, 27a).

Intellectual Problems. But though the dominant note of the Epistle lies undoubtedly in its practical appeal for loyalty and its warning against the danger of relapse, it has also a strong interest in the intellectual problems of the time. It was never an easy thing in the first century to reconcile Christianity with the old Jewish faith. To the mind of the Jews, it was a fundamental belief that the O.T. contained the final revelation of God and that in the Law of Moses God had made known completely his will and purpose. If that is so, what need is there of any further revelation? Does not Christianity become superfluous? What room is left for Jesus Christ? Questions such as these were of intense interest in the debates that took place in the apostolic age between Christianity and Judaism. Paul had to face the problem in one of its aspects in the Epistle to the Galatians—and the Epistle to the Hebrews deals with another phase of the same issue. The Epistle denies that the O.T. contains a complete and final revelation of the will of God—God spoke to the prophets “in broken fragments” (1¹) only. It is only in Christianity—in the revelation through his Son, that there has been a complete manifestation of his will.

Philosophical Background. In order to understand the strength and force of the argument of Hebrews it is necessary for us to realize the philosophical background of the Epistle. Hebrews appears on the surface to be one of the most Jewish writings we possess. The argument seems to move entirely within the circle of Jewish ideas. From its commencement to its close—from the string of quotations in the first chapter to the appeal to the altar and the sacrifice of beasts whose bodies were burned outside the camp in the last—the thought of the Epistle seems to be “cribb’d, cabin’d, and confin’d” within the narrow precincts of Jewish thought. In reality, however, when we look beneath the surface, we find that there is no book in the N.T. which is so tinged with Greek ideas. The nerve of the argument of Hebrews is Greek and not Jewish. Hebrews is the first great attempt that was made to explain Christianity in terms of the Platonic philosophy. The characteristic feature of Plato’s philosophy is what is known as his “Doctrine of Ideas”—a theory by which he maintained that everything on earth has a heavenly counterpart which is the true reality and of which the earthly thing is only a shadow and imperfect copy. The heavenly archetypes are the supreme facts. They are not mere abstractions of thought. They actually exist in the heavens, the perfect types of their imperfect representations upon earth. This theory is taken up by the author of Hebrews in the contrast which he draws between the earthly and the heavenly tabernacles. The true sanctuary “which the Lord pitched and not man” is in heaven (82). The earthly tabernacle is but a shadow and a copy of the heavenly reality (85 923 101). The difference between the O.T. and Christianity is, therefore, this: in the O.T. we have only the earthly shadows of the heavenly realities: in the N.T. the heavenly realities themselves have broken into the world of time and space. (Cf. pp. 1066–7, 1253–5.)

A Philosophy of the Christian Religion. The Epistle to the Hebrews therefore is the first attempt to create a philosophy of the Christian religion. It defends and expounds its Christian faith in terms of current philosophical thought. Its main theme may be condensed into a single phrase: Jesus Christ is the ideal High Priest who offered the ideal sacrifice in the ideal sanctuary. The writer does not make any attempt to prove the need of the priest or the sacrifice or the sanctuary. He assumes that they are the three essential elements of religion and that no religion can exist without them. Like all the other facts of life, they have their heavenly counterparts. In their ideal forms they exist only in the heavenly sphere. As earthly institutions they are but imperfect representations of the true realities. The priesthood is defective. The priests are imperfect men. They are constantly changing. There is no permanence about them. The sacrifices are defective. They cannot cleanse the guilty conscience.

They can make no real atonement for sin. Even the Temple is defective since it represents merely a copy of the heavenly original. The religion of the O.T., therefore, only provides an imperfect sacrifice offered by imperfect priests in an earthly sanctuary.

In contrast to this defective system, Christianity provides a perfect sacrifice offered by a perfect High Priest in a perfect sanctuary. The heavenly realities have been brought down to earth in the transcendent person and work of Jesus Christ, who as the Son of God has made the perfect revelation of the divine will and purpose, and by his sacrifice has wrought out the perfect redemption for mankind.

The Plan of the Epistle. These two main lines of thought in the Epistle—the practical and the intellectual—are so interwoven that it is not easy to disentangle them. The march of the argument is often side-tracked by the digressions. The practical interests of the writer and his earnest moral appeals often override and obscure the elucidation of his theological thesis. It is therefore necessary for the student to study carefully the map of the plan of the book. If we omit the digressions and the paragraphs of practical appeal, it will be found that the development of the line of argument proceeds along the following course: (1) The writer begins in 11–14 by proving the supremacy of Christ over the Angels. (2) After a digression in ch. 2 he demonstrates in a short paragraph, 31–6, the superiority of Christ to Moses. (3) Then after a long digression in the latter part of ch. 3 and ch. 4 he indicates in 51–10 the defects of the priestly system of Judaism and suggests that Christ is the supreme High Priest after the order of Melchizedek. (4) More digressions follow, and it is only when we come to ch. 7 that the line of thought adumbrated in 51–10 is worked out in detail and the supremacy of the high-priestly work of Christ demonstrated. (5) In ch. 8 the writer shows that Christ is not only the ideal High Priest but that he ministers in an ideal sanctuary, and his ministry constitutes the establishment of a new covenant between man and God. (6) In ch. 9 the writer demonstrates that Christ as the supreme High Priest offered the supreme sacrifice for the sins of the world. (7) The argument culminates in ch. 101–18, where the writer again demonstrates the futility of the Jewish sacrifices, and the finality and completeness of the redemption wrought by Christ. Thus the main argument of the book is found in the following passages: 11–14 31–6 51–10 71–1018. It is in the last section, 71–1018, that the largest and most sustained and most subtle piece of reasoning in the Epistle is found.

The chief digressions from the main argument may be summarized as follows: (1) In ch. 2 the writer turns aside to discuss the significance of the sufferings of Christ. (2) From 37 to 41⁶ there is a long digression on the promise of rest—a promise which has never yet been realized—and which, therefore, is a great inheritance into which the writer summons the Christians of his own time to enter. (3) From 51¹ to 62⁰ there is a long warning against relapse, in which the writer describes the supreme peril involved in forsaking the faith. (4) 10¹⁸⁻³⁹ contains another great appeal and a further warning of the fate which awaits those who fall away from the Christian faith. (5) Chs. 11 and 12 contain a final challenge based on the heroic story of the saints and martyrs of the past, a further discussion of the meaning of suffering (127-13), and a very powerful description of the contrast between the Old Covenant and the New. (6) Ch. 13 gives some final injunctions and personal messages.

No student should attempt to read the Epistle through until he has, first of all, constructed a map of its contents on the basis of the facts which have just been given. To understand Hebrews it is necessary to have a very clear idea of the writer's objective in each section of the Epistle.

The Question of Authorship. It is quite impossible to determine with anything like certainty who was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Origen, writing about the year 225 A.D., said, "Who wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews God only knows," and modern scholarship to-day is equally incompetent to arrive at a sure decision. The traditional view—which was preserved in the title given to the Epistle in the A.V. ascribing the Epistle to the apostle Paul—has now been entirely abandoned. It was challenged in ancient times. Its style is quite different from Paul's manner of writing. And though at first sight there seems to be on the surface a community of ideas between Hebrews and the epistles of Paul, when we come to make a detailed examination it becomes apparent that the differences between the two writers are far more extensive than the resemblances. The thought of the writer of Hebrews moves almost entirely in the region of the Jewish sacrificial system, which is very rarely referred to at all in the Pauline epistles. The great mystical conception of union with the risen Christ which is so characteristic of Pauline thought is entirely absent from Hebrews. Theologically speaking, at any rate in matters of detail, the two writers seem to stand almost in antithesis to each other.

Probably the name which has won most support among modern scholars is that of Barnabas. Among the ancients Tertullian certainly thought that he was the author of the Epistle. And Origen in one of his moods, as we know from his recently discovered Tractatus, held the same view. There are many points about Barnabas which render his claim reasonable. He was a Levite and so would naturally be interested in the details of the sacrificial system. He seems to have lived in Cyprus (Acts 43⁶), where it would be possible for him to come into contact with the thought of Alexandria. But the arguments do not amount to proof; and it is not easy to see why, if he were the author, the book should have been published without his name attached to it.

Luther made the brilliant suggestion that Apollos was the real writer of the book. From the description of Apollos in Acts 18²⁴⁻²⁸ it is clear that he is the type of man who might have written the Epistle—but, in the absence of any tangible evidence, the theory can never be more than pure hypothesis. Luke, Clement of Rome, Silas, and Philip have all at different times found their supporters, but the arguments which have been put forward to prove the case have failed to carry conviction.

The most interesting modern theory (which has secured the championship of such outstanding scholars as Harnack and Rendel Harris and Peake) is that the book was written by Priscilla with the help of her husband Aquila. Quite a romance has been built up around the name of Priscilla. On the evidence of certain inscriptions which have been found on the catacombs and elsewhere, it is supposed that Priscilla originally belonged to a distinguished family of high social standing in the city of Rome. She lost caste, however, through her marriage with the Jew Aquila and was disowned by her family. When she and her husband became Christians she won a position in the Christian Church which more than atoned for the sacrifice she made at the time of her marriage. She is supposed to have written the Epistle to the Hebrews anonymously, because in that age it would seriously have detracted from the value of the book if it had been known that it was the work of a woman.

The theory is attractive and certainly does help to explain some of the characteristics of the Epistle, but it is only guesswork and does not rest upon any substantial foundation of fact. There is one point that militates against it rather strongly. In 11³² the writer uses the phrase, "Time would fail me telling," etc.

The participle translated "telling" is in the masculine gender in Greek. Priscilla, of course, might have concealed the fact of her authorship by using a masculine participle, but the sentence might have been written in a dozen different ways, and it is scarcely credible to suppose that she would have selected a phrase which made it necessary for her to suggest to the world that the book was written by a man.

Characteristics of the Author. But though we cannot determine the name of the author of Hebrews we can form a fairly clear conception of his personality. (1) He was first of all pre-eminently a preacher. He speaks of the Epistle as a "word of exhortation" (13²²). Time after time he abandons the main line of argument in order to preach. His digression on the "rest of God" in chs. 3 and 4 is one of the best specimens we possess of an early Christian sermon. (2) He was a man of great literary ability. There is no book in the N.T. written in better Greek than the Epistle to the Hebrews. If there is any truth in the dictum, "The style is the man," we are bound to admit that the author of Hebrews was a literary genius. (3) He was a man of wide philosophical knowledge. He was intimately acquainted, as we have seen, with the whole system of Platonic philosophy. A phrase which he uses in 11¹³ shows that he was equally familiar with the Epicurean theory of the universe, and some technical terms which he employs in 5¹⁴ make it plain that he was conversant with Aristotelianism. In the most skillful way he brings his wide range of knowledge to the interpretation of the Christian faith. (4) If he was a Jew, as he probably was (though this is incapable of absolute proof), he belonged to the more liberal school known as the Hellenists. The Bible which he used and from which he constantly quotes, is the Greek translation known as the Septuagint (LXX), and not the original Hebrew text, with which he does not seem to have been acquainted. (5) In interpreting the O.T., like all the scholars of Alexandria, he used the allegorical method. There is more restraint, however, in his application of the method than there is in the case of Philo, with whose writings he was certainly familiar and from whom he derived many of his ideas. The best illustration of the use of allegory in Hebrews is the treatment of Melchizedek in 7¹⁻¹⁰. (6) He was passionately devoted to the Christian faith. To him it was the only adequate and final philosophy. A knowledge of philosophy often blunts the edge of faith, but in the case of the author of Hebrews it served to strengthen and intensify it. He was an enthusiast, and his enthusiasm was based on knowledge and insight. It was a great boon to Christianity in early times that it possessed so convinced and so well-informed an advocate as the unknown author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

The Recipients of the Epistle. The title of the Epistle, which is found in all the ancient manuscripts, tells us that it was written "to the Hebrews." The word "Hebrew" had a specific meaning in N.T. times. It is used in antithesis to the term "Hellenist." The Hebrew was a conservative type of Jew who maintained the use of the Hebrew tongue, used a Hebrew Bible, and carried out strictly the injunctions of the Jewish law even though he might be living in a foreign land. The Hellenist, on the other hand, was much less rigid. He conformed to the customs of the people among whom he was living, used the Greek language, and read the Greek version of the Bible. The title suggests that the Epistle was written for Hebrews in general, in whatever part of the world they might happen to be living. There are, however, certain specific references in Hebrews which make it clear that the writer has a particular group or fellowship of Hebrew Christians in mind. He tells us, for instance, in 13¹⁹ that he intends to visit them. He praises the services which they had rendered to the saints (6^{10,11}). He bemoans their dullness and the slowness of their development in the Christian life (5^{11,12}). It seems, therefore, perfectly obvious that he is writing to a particular community and not to Hebrews at large.

But where did this particular community live? That is a question which it is not so easy to answer. There has been a great diversity of opinion upon the point among modern scholars. Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Rome have all had their advocates. On the whole, opinion to-day seems to preponderate in favor of Rome. We know that the Epistle was known and used in Rome earlier than in any other place, for it is quoted at considerable length by Clement of Rome—the earliest Christian writer outside the N.T., who wrote an epistle to the Corinthians about the year 95 A.D. A further point in favor of this theory is to be found in the phrase in 13²⁴, "They of Italy salute you," which seems to refer to Italian friends of the members of the church who were at that time in contact with the author of the Epistle, possibly at Alexandria. The best modern theory, therefore, is that the Epistle was written for a community of Jewish Christians living in the city of Rome.

The Date of the Epistle. The limits within which it is possible for the Epistle to have been written lie between the years 60 and 96 A.D. The latter date is determined by the fact that it was quoted by Clement of Rome about that time. The earlier date is settled by the implications in 2¹³ and 13⁷ that a generation of Christians had already passed away. Within these limits there are two dates which have been warmly advocated by different scholars of repute. The earlier, which puts the Epistle between 64 and 67, connects it with the period immediately following the Neronian persecution. The main argument upon which this theory rests is the absence of any reference in the Epistle to the destruction of Jerusalem, which occurred in the year 70 A.D. It is maintained that if the book had been written after 70 A.D., there must have been some allusion to that event. An argument which is based upon silence is always precarious. It is almost equivalent to the assumption that no book could be published to-day without some reference to the European war. The other date suggested for the Epistle falls in the reign of Domitian (somewhere between 80 and 90). This date seems the more probable of the two. The church is face to face with an organized form of persecution. In the time of Nero persecution was spasmodic and irregular, and it was not till Domitian that it became a settled and permanent policy of the empire. Moreover, though there is no allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem, the arguments of the Epistle seem to be intended to comfort Jewish Christians who were smarting under the destruction of the Temple and the overthrow of the Levitical system.

The Form of the Epistle. The Epistle to the Hebrews lacks the marks of an ordinary letter. It was an invariable rule in ancient times that a letter should begin, as all the epistles of Paul do, for instance, by stating the name of the writer and giving a message of greeting to the recipients. There is nothing of this kind in Hebrews. The writer plunges at once in medias res without the slightest reference to himself or the people to whom he is writing. How is this strange opening to be explained? Some scholars think that the writer had some special reason for wishing to conceal his identity. Others, again, suppose that the book is not an epistle at all but a theological treatise. The latter theory seems unlikely in view of the personal references and appeals in the book, especially in ch. 13. It seems probable that the writer of Hebrews constructed his book, as many modern preachers do, out of sermons and addresses which he had delivered on different occasions, weaving them, of course, into a unity, and making them all serve his main argument. It was originally intended probably as "a tract for the times."

The author had in mind not merely the particular church to which it was finally sent but the whole body of Jewish (and probably Gentile) Christians of his time. The last chapter may have been added when the author despatched his book to the church at Rome.

The Place of the Epistle in the New Testament Canon. It is rather surprising to find that an epistle of such value as Hebrews had some difficulty in securing its place in the N.T. and that it was a long time before it won general acceptance. Eusebius, writing about 325 A.D., tells us that even in his day "some rejected the Epistle to the Hebrews on the ground that it was controverted by the Roman Church as not being Paul's." Speaking generally it may be said that the Epistle at the end of the second century A.D. was accepted in the Eastern division of Christendom and rejected in the West. It is omitted from the Muratorian canon (about 200 AD.), and little importance was attached to it by the Latin Fathers. The ground for its rejection seems to have been the conviction that it was not written by Paul. The Alexandrian Fathers, on the other hand—Pantænus, Clement and Origen—were unanimous in accepting the Epistle on the ground of its intrinsic merit, though some of them questioned the Pauline authorship. This cleavage of opinion between the East and the West is best explained by Westcott: "The Easterns, attracted by the intrinsic value of the work, accepted it, and because of its intrinsic value tried to connect it with Paul. The Westerns, feeling sure that it was not the work of Paul, rejected it solely on this ground—their rule being not to admit anything into the canon which could not be definitely traced back to an Apostle." "Experience," Westcott adds, "has shown us how to unite the conclusions on both sides. We have been enabled to acknowledge that the apostolic authority of the Epistle is independent of the Pauline authorship. The spiritual insight of the East can be joined with the historic witness of the West."

Literature: The best critical commentaries on Hebrews are those of Moffatt (International Critical Commentary) and Westcott, but both these are based upon the Greek text and their value is restricted to scholars. The best commentaries for ordinary readers are Peake (Century Bible), and A. B. Davidson (Handbooks for Bible Classes). Among the books which deal with the general teaching of the Epistle, the most useful are Dale, The Jewish Temple and the Christian Faith; Bruce, The Epistle to the Hebrews; Milligan, The Theology of the Epistle to the Hebrews; Nairne, The Epistle of the Priesthood.

CHAPTER I

1-3. Introduction: God's Self-Revelation Consummated in the Person and Work of a Son. The most remarkable feature about the commencement of the Epistle is that none of the marks of an ordinary letter are to be found at all. The writer plunges at once into his great theme without any personal references or salutations. Some scholars think this proves that the so-called epistle is not a letter at all but a theological treatise. Others (e.g., Harnack and Peake) maintain that the absence of the usual personalia is due to the fact that the Epistle is very largely the work of Priscilla, and that, being a woman, she countered the prejudice that would otherwise have arisen by omitting any reference to herself (see p. 1297).

The introductory paragraph states the theme of the whole book. The writer boldly states the position which he intends to maintain in face of the two problems which faced the church in his day: (1) What is the relation between the Christian faith and the O.T.? If the O.T. contains a final revelation of the will of God, as every Jew considered that it did, what need is there of any further revelation? Is not Christianity therefore superfluous? (2) What is the true interpretation of the Person and work of Christ? How are we to explain his relation to God and the value of his sacrifice? The first sentence deals with the first problem and the remaining verse of the introduction with the second. The R.V. translation rather blurs the contrast which the writer draws between the O.T. and the Christian faith. God having spoken of old time . . . by divers portions and in divers manners. It makes the point clearer if we translate the last two clauses in many fragments and by many methods. The contrasts which the writer tries to bring out are: (1) The O.T. revelation was fragmentary and piecemeal; the Christian faith is final and complete. (2) In the O.T. many methods were adopted as the vehicle of the divine communications. God made use of historians and prophets and psalmists at different times; the Christian faith is revealed in one way and one way only, i.e., through Christ. (3) In the O.T. God used human agencies, e.g., the prophets; the Christian faith has been brought to the world by God's own Son.

At this point the statement passes to the second problem. Who was the Son? How does he stand related to God? What was his achievement? The writer replies to these questions: (1) The Son had been appointed by God heir of all things. The order of the words proves that the reference here is to a pretem-poral and therefore eternal act of God. (2) He was the agent of God in the creation of the world—a statement which reminds us of the great passage in Colossians (115-18) in which the apostle Paul describes the cosmic activity of Christ in the work of creation. (3) The next phrases, the effulgence of his glory and the very image of his substance, describe the relationship between Christ and God. Both are metaphors. The first is borrowed from a passage in the Book of Wisdom (726), which describes Wisdom as “an effulgence from everlasting light.” The Greek word may mean either “reflection” or “radiance,” and the phrase therefore may signify either (a) that the glory of God was reflected in the person Jesus Christ and mirrored in his work, or (b)—and this seems the more probable explanation—that as the light streams from the sun the radiance of the glory of God streams from Christ. The metaphor in the second phrase is different. The word translated very image means, literally, the stamp cut by a die, and so the impress made upon a seal: thus the phrase signifies that the essence of the divine nature was stamped on the Person of Christ. He was the impress of God's essence. (4) The fourth statement, upholding all things by the word of his power, means that Christ is the center of the life of the universe. Compare the statement in Col. 117, “in him all things consist” (or cohere). (5) The next statement defines the work of Christ during his earthly life. He made purification for sins. This phrase emphasizes the redemptive work of Christ, which is to be the main theme of the book. (6) Finally he ascended to heaven and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.

Such is the summary of the writer's conception of Christ, and it becomes all the more remarkable when we remember that these words must have been written within fifty years of the crucifixion.

4-14. The Superiority of Christ to the Angels. (See also ch. 2.) At this point the introduction slides off into the first great argument of the Epistle, which sets out to prove the superiority of Christ to the angels. This occupies the remainder of ch. 1 and the whole of ch. 2. The course of the argument falls into the following divisions: (1) The statement of the theme (v. 4). (2) The first set of proofs (vv. 5-14). (3) The practical application (21-4). (4) The second proof (25-8). (5) The reply to the objection that the humiliation and death of Christ prove that he is of lower rank than the angels (29-18).

The theme is found in the concluding words of the introduction which form the transition to the new line of argument—Having become so much better than the angels. The more excellent name is the name of Son. The first set of proofs is composed of quotations from the O.T. We must remember that the fulfillment of prophecy was the first line of defense for Christians in the apostolic age, and there was no argument that appealed more cogently to the Jewish mind. The relevance of the whole discussion can be best appreciated by referring again to the Epistle to the Colossians, in which Paul finds himself compelled to deal with a theory which identified Jesus with one of the lowest of the angels. It is quite possible that this theory still survived and that in the opening chapters of Hebrews we have the second great attempt to give it a death blow. (Cf. pp. 1253-5.)

The proof-texts which the writer cites from the O.T. are seven in number: (1) The first two are taken respectively from Psa. 27 and 2 Sam. 7¹⁴ and are intended to prove that O.T. prophecy bestowed the title Son on Christ. (2) The next quotation does not occur in the Hebrew Bible but is an addition which the LXX makes to the Hebrew text of Deut. 32⁴³. It is interesting to note that the writer does not scruple to use a text which is not found in the O.T. proper.

There is a difficulty about the phrase which is used to introduce the third quotation (v. 6). The word again may be connected with the main verb as in the R.V. or it may be used separately to indicate the use of another quotation as in the R.V. mg. The reference in the phrase when he bringeth . . . into the world seems to be the second advent of Christ. (3) Of the next two contrasted proof-texts the first (v. 7) is taken from Psa. 104⁴. In the Hebrew there is no reference to angels. The psalmist is referring to the forces of nature which God uses as his agents. "Who maketh winds his messengers; his ministers a flaming fire." The LXX, however, modified the translation of the Hebrew and the writer of the Epistle adopted its renderings. The second quotation (vv. 8, 9) is from Psa. 45^{6, 7}. In contrast to the humbler position of the angels the Son is accorded divine rank and his throne is described as eternal. He has been anointed by God and set in a higher position than all his fellows. (4) The quotation in vv. 10-12 is taken from Psa. 102²⁵⁻²⁷. It describes the Son as the creator of heaven and earth and says that though they are transitory and will pass away, the Son abideth forever. (5) The last proof-text, in which the writer reaches the climax of his argument in v. 13, is the famous passage in Psa. 110¹. It represents the final return of the Son to heaven in triumph—and the argument is that such words as these cannot be applied to angels.

CHAPTER II

1-4. The Practical Application of the Preceding Argument. This paragraph illustrates the interest taken by the writer of Hebrews in the practical bearing of theology upon life. His purpose is not merely to demonstrate the truth of a theological proposition but to show also how that truth has a meaning for life and conduct. "If I have made out my case," he argues, "if I have proved the superiority of Christ to the angels, then it follows that we ought to pay greater heed to his teaching than to the Law which was given through the medium of angels—for how shall we escape if we neglect the great salvation?" This salvation was first of all proclaimed by the Lord himself and was passed on by the original disciples to the next generation of believers, and all the way through it has been confirmed by miracles and the outpouring of the Holy Spirit.

The phrase in v. 1, lest we drift away, is very significant. One of the problems with which the church was confronted at this time was the drift of its members back to the world under stress of persecution. The word spoken through angels (v. 2) contains a reference to the later Jewish belief, which is not found in the O.T. itself but occurs in an addition which the LXX makes to the text of Deut. 33², that angels were used as intermediaries in the giving of the Law. The same idea is also found in other passages of the N.T., e.g., Acts 7⁵³ Gal. 3¹⁹. It is interesting to note that miracles are regarded in v. 4 as confirming the truth of the Christian gospel. The reference is not merely to the miracles of Christ; it includes also the miracles wrought by the apostles. (Cf. the claim of Paul in Rom. 15¹⁹ and 2 Cor. 12¹² that his work had been attended by miracles.) The gifts of the Holy Ghost refer to Pentecost primarily and also to the later bestowal of spiritual gifts (as in 1 Cor. 12-14).

5-8. Additional Proof that Christ is Superior to the Angels. The writer now turns back again to the argument from which he had departed at the end of ch. 1. The new point is made with the utmost brevity. Christ (and not the angels) is to be Lord of the future. The world to come is the new era which is to be established on earth at the return of Christ. The quotation which is used to prove the argument is taken from Psa. 84-6. The term Son of man, which was originally in the mind of the psalmist simply a synonym for man (the two opening clauses being strictly parallel), is here taken as a Messianic reference to Christ, and the significant words of the quotation are to be found in the last two sentences, which predict the final triumphant reign of Christ over the earth. The first part of v. 8 clinches the argument and states that nothing will finally be uncontrolled by Christ. (Cf. p. 846.)

9-18. The Reply to Objections and the Significance of the Death of Christ. The relation of the remaining part of ch. 2 to the writer's main line of argument is not easy at first sight to detect. The connection appears to be this: There is one clause in the quotation which has just been cited which seems to give away the writer's case, namely, the phrase, Thou makest him a little lower than the angels. These words are evidently supposed to refer to the humiliation of Jesus during his earthly life. Why was this humiliation necessary? What is the explanation of the sufferings of Jesus? It is to questions such as these that our attention is directed in the last part of this chapter. Jesus was made lower than the angels that he might taste death for every man and become the author of their salvation (v. 10). In order to do this it was necessary for Christ to be perfected through suffering (v. 10). He had to share our human nature and be made like unto his brethren (v. 14), that he might overcome the power of death and of the devil (v. 15). He must identify himself with us and endure our temptations that he might be able to come to our rescue (v. 18).

9. There are many interesting points in this statement, but before we can discuss them there is to be faced in v. 9 a serious difficulty, one which has given rise to much debate. The question turns on the meaning of the clause Crowned with glory and honor. We should naturally expect that the coronation would follow and not precede the words that he should taste death for every man. The triumph of Christ naturally follows the cross and does not come before it. The difficulty probably arises from the congestion of ideas involved in the statement, and the fact that the rush of these ideas has probably interfered with the logical exposition of the writer's thought.

The writer begins the sentence by drawing the contrast between Jesus in his earthly humiliation and his subsequent glory. We see Jesus made a little (or for a little while) lower than the angels and afterward crowned with glory and honor. And then, as an afterthought, to make the purpose of the humiliation more explicit, he adds the phrase that by the grace of God he [may] taste death for every man. The latter phrase is not dependent on the words crowned with glory and honor but is the conclusion of the whole statement. It should be mentioned, however, that there are some scholars who take a different view and think that the earthly life of Jesus may be described as a coronation, because the choice of the cross as a supreme act of self-sacrifice may be said to have crowned him with glory and honor. But this idea is too modern to be likely to contain the true solution of the problem. There is a curious reading found in some of the ancient Fathers which substitutes for the phrase by the grace of God the words "apart from God," and the reference is supposed to be to the sense of dereliction which led Jesus to cry out as he was dying upon the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

16. This has also been a matter of dispute. For verily not of angels does he take hold, but he taketh hold of the seed of Abraham. Two interpretations have been given of these words. One is found in the translation of the A.V. For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; i.e., he did not become incarnate in the form of an angel, but he took upon himself our human nature. The second and probably the correct explanation of the text is, "He did not come to the help of angels, but he comes to the help of men."

This paragraph contains some of the most characteristic ideas of the Epistle. (1) The purpose of the humiliation of Jesus was the salvation of the race (v. 9). (2) As the author or pioneer of salvation it was fitting that Jesus should be made perfect through suffering (v. 10). The problem of suffering is felt very acutely in the Bible (cf. the book of Job), and was aggravated for the Christian by the sufferings of Christ. It is here suggested that one element in the purpose of suffering is the perfection of character. There is nothing, however, in this statement which conflicts with the view that Jesus "was holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (726). The meaning is, rather, that Jesus could not be a perfect mediator between man and God unless he shared in the sorrows and tribulations of his brethren (see also 58, 9). (3) Though Christ has been described in the first chapter as the radiance of the glory of God and the impress of his essence, yet on the manward side he is one with the human race (vv. 11-14). The Saviour and the saved are alike of one origin and therefore he is not ashamed to call them brethren. Three passages are quoted from the O.T. to prove the bond of union that exists between Christ and men. The first (v. 12) is taken from Psa. 22:22. Here God is represented as saying, I will declare thy name [i.e., the Messiah's] unto my brethren. The other two (v. 13) come from Isa. 8:17, 18. (4) The motive of the incarnation now becomes apparent. Since then the children are sharers in flesh and blood, he also himself in like manner partook of the same (v. 14). It was only by taking our human nature that Jesus could identify himself with the race. To the writer of Hebrews the doctrine of the incarnation is of supreme importance, since it is only through the incarnation and all that it involves, that the cross gains significance and validity. (5) Vv. 14 and 15 are a surprise. We expect the writer to speak of the redemptive work of Christ and its power to save men from sin. But suddenly he goes off on another line—and describes the result of Christ's work in terms of deliverance from the fear of death. Death is here regarded as the work of the devil. This idea is common in Jewish thought. The writer is probably thinking of a famous passage in the Book of Wisdom (223, 24): "God created man for incorruption, and made him an image of his own proper being. But by the envy of the devil death entered into the world, and they that are of his portion make trial thereof." The statement of Hebrews reminds us of the words in 2 Tim. 110, "Our Saviour Christ Jesus, who abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light." The problem of the future life was very acute in the first century. The quest for some token of immortality was keenly pursued, especially in the Greek mystery cults. Not the least thing that Jesus did was to give men a complete assurance of a future life and so lift the burden of fear that weighed so heavily upon their spirits. (See art., Backgrounds, p. 850.)

16-18. The whole line of argument is summed up in the concluding verses of the chapter. It was necessary for Christ to be made like unto his brethren in all things. The last phrase is emphatic. It excludes all forms of the Doketic heresy, which maintained that the humanity of Jesus was unreal and only formed a kind of mask (cf. 1 John 42). The idea is repeated in 415, "one that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin." The motive for the complete incarnation was twofold: (1) That Christ might be a merciful and faithful High Priest to make propitiation for the sins of the people. Here for the first time the writer reaches the idea which is to be the keynote of the Epistle—the high-priestly work of Christ—but he reaches it only to leave it again, for the next reference to it (except for a brief allusion in 31) is in 414. (2) But there is another motive given in v. 18 which is also an important characteristic of the Epistle. In that he suffered . . . he is able to succor them that are tempted. It is because Christ lived our human life and passed through all its experience, that we can be sure that he understands the sorrow and suffering of life and can sympathize with us. The word translated tempted may refer either (a) to inner temptation or (b) to outward trial or persecution.

Probably both ideas are included here. Jesus had to face both inner temptation, as in the wilderness, and outward persecution, as in the death upon the cross and all that preceded it, and therefore he is able to succor us and sympathize with our troubles from whatever source they may come.

CHAPTER III

With 31 begins the second section of the Epistle. This section is composed of two main parts: (1) A short argument to prove the superiority of Christ to Moses (31-6). (2) A long digression of practical appeal (37-413).

1-6. The Superiority of Christ to Moses. Though the paragraph which deals with this point consists of only six verses, it is extremely important. The Jews believed that in the Law Moses had given to the Jewish race a complete and final revelation of the will of God. He had spoken the last word and there was nothing more to be said. It was essential, therefore, that a Christian apologist should prove that the authority of Christ was greater than that of Moses. The writer tries to demonstrate his point by two arguments. (1) The first is given in v. 3 in the phrase he that built the house hath more honor than the house. Moses belongs to the created world, Christ is the Creator (cf. 12). The creator is greater than the thing created, therefore Christ is greater than Moses. (2) The second argument is in v. 5. Moses is described in Num. 127.8 as a servant of God "faithful in all mine house: with him will I speak mouth to mouth." The latter clause refers to the words in v. 5, for a testimony of those things which were afterward to be spoken, i.e., the Law. Moses is, therefore, a servant in the house while Christ is a Son with a position of authority over it. Such is the main thread of the argument.

There are some interesting phrases in these verses. In v. 1 Christ is called the Apostle and High Priest of our confession. The early church cannot be said to have possessed a creed in any formal sense of the term, but it had a confession of belief, and its content is summarized in the words, "Jesus, Apostle and High Priest." There is a further reference to this confession in 414. It is interesting to note that the word Apostle is here applied to Christ. The word means in this connection "the delegate" or "envoy" of God, and when it is used of men it is generally equivalent in meaning to our word "missionary." What is involved in the term High Priest as it is used of Christ will become apparent in the later chapters of the Epistle. The words of v. 6, if we hold fast . . . unto the end, indicate one of the main warnings of the Epistle. The danger of relapse was great. Many men who started well on the Christian race fell away. It is not so much the start as the finish of the race that counts (cf. also v. 14 and the words of Jesus in Mt. 1022).

7-19. Digression: A Practical Appeal (continued in 41-13). At this point the writer digresses from the main argument. The digression contains a very fine specimen of a sermon or homily. It is complete in itself and is one of the most perfect examples we possess of the method of preaching in the apostolic age. The author takes a text, expounds its meaning, draws out the ideas involved in it, and then makes a practical appeal to his hearers.

There has been much discussion as to the connection between the digression, or sermon, and the previous argument. We saw that at the commencement of ch. 2 the writer clinches one of his arguments by making a great practical appeal, and many scholars think that this apparent digression is a similar kind of appeal though of much greater length. Others—and this seems to be the most natural view—think that throughout this section there runs a sort of latent contrast between the failure of the work of Moses and the success of the work of Christ. It was because Moses failed in bringing the nation into "the rest of God" that the work of Christ was rendered necessary.

The digression, or sermon, is composed of the following parts: (1) The text and the statement of the theme (vv. 7-14). (2) The explanation of the text (vv. 15-19). (3) The theological idea and promise involved in the text (41-10). (4) The final application and appeal (411-13).

7-14. The Text of the Theme. The text is taken from Psa. 95⁷⁻¹¹. The main theme is concerned with the failure of the people of Israel during their sojourn in the wilderness to hear the voice of God through the hardness of their hearts and their rebellion against him. As a consequence of this revolt God kept them in the wilderness for forty years and would not allow them to enter into a peaceful life in the land of promise. This text is used by the author of the Epistle as a warning to the people of his own day. "Be careful," he urges, "that history does not repeat itself in your own case. Hardness and rebellion against God will be as fatal for you as for the Israelites of old. See that an evil heart of unbelief does not lead you to revolt against God. It is only those who keep their faith and courage firm to the end who can be said to belong to Christ."

15-19. The Explanation of the Text. The author or preacher now proceeds to explain the historical references in the text, "Who were these people with whom God was angry?" he asks. They were the people of Israel whom Moses had led out of the Egyptian captivity. Their carcasses are bleaching in the wilderness as a proof of their unbelief.

CHAPTER IV

1-10. The Theological Idea Involved in the Above Text. It is this section that contains the interesting and original part of the sermon. Taking up the last clause of the text, They shall not enter into my rest, the writer argues that these words imply a divine promise of eternal value. Throughout history God had held out to the world the vision and ideal of rest and peace, but up to the present the great promise of God had not been appropriated by humanity. The people of Israel might have inherited it, but their obstinacy and blindness led them to revolt. The psalmist repeated the promise in his day and generation, but once again the people refused to grasp it. The unrealized promise is still available for Christians, if only they will seize the opportunity of making it their own.

When we think of the circumstances amid which these early Christians lived—the persecutions they had to endure, the dangers that threatened them, the sense of insecurity that always oppressed them, the fear of imprisonment or the confiscation of their property—we can understand how this section of the sermon, with its promise of peace and rest, must have appealed to them. God's ideal not only for these primitive Christians but for the world is the ideal of peace. The prophet Isaiah had proclaimed the Messiah as the "Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9⁶), and had foretold the coming of a time when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." When Christ came, it actually looked as if the promise would be realized. His advent seemed to usher in the era of peace. As Milton puts it in his "Ode to the Nativity":

"No war or battle's sound
Was heard the world around,
The idle spear and shield were high uphung;
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood,
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng.
The kings sat still with awful eye
As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was by."

But it was only a fitful gleam of the vision of peace that came to the world. Another chance was missed. War, strife, and persecution broke out again with new intensity. And yet the promise of God stood firm and still stands firm to-day.

The argument which is worked out in this section of the sermon may be paraphrased thus: "The promise of peace which has never yet been realized still holds good for us (v. 1). We must see to it that we too do not miss the opportunity of obtaining it. The good news has been proclaimed to us as it was to our forefathers. It was unbelief that made them fail (v. 2). We who believe may lay hold upon that promise and make it our own. The promise has existed from the first. It is one of the works of God that were finished at the creation of the world (v. 3). The proof of this may be seen in the statement of Scripture which declares that, after the making of the world, God rested on the seventh day. Rest, therefore, is an attribute of God. It is divine. It is God's ideal for mankind (vv. 4, 5). The promise still remains to be realized. The Israelites failed through disobedience (v. 6). Joshua failed too to lead the nation into rest (v. 8). The psalmist offered the promise to the men of his day (v. 7): they did not accept it, and so it was postponed for future generations." The climax of the argument is reached in v. 9. "There still remains a rest like the peace of a Sabbath day for the people of God to realize, and this rest will be like that which came to God himself when, after the creation, he rested from his works."

11-13. The Final Appeal. The last words of the sermon are an earnest appeal to the Christians of the first century to give diligence to secure for themselves the promise of rest and not to lose their opportunity through disobedience like their forefathers. The ground for the urgency of the writer's appeal is given in vv. 12, 13. Though the word of God (and by this phrase the writer means the revelation of God as it is given in the O.T. and the teaching of Jesus) contains great and inalienable promises, there is another side to it as well. It contains the threat of judgment. It is no dead letter, no antiquated theory. It is alive and active. It is like a sword with a double edge—one the edge of promise and hope, the other the edge of reproof and retribution. And this sword of judgment does not merely make a flesh wound; it penetrates to the very core of our being, and touches the vital spot where body and soul are united together. And, moreover, its verdict is passed not merely upon outward acts of sin and of disloyalty—it judges the thoughts and the intentions of the heart. A man does not need to commit open apostasy in order to come under its condemnation. The apostasy of the mind is equally a matter that falls under its jurisdiction. There is no possibility of concealing our inner disloyalties from God. There is no man whose life is not like an open book to him. Everything we do or think is naked and open to God. We may try to cloak our deeds and hide away our thoughts in the secret recesses of our souls, but the eyes of God penetrate through all the masks and guises in which we have sought concealment and our souls are stripped bare before their gaze. It is to be noticed that in these verses the writer follows the teaching of Jesus in the stress which he lays upon the motives and intentions which lie behind conduct and give it its moral value. Compare the statements of Jesus in Mt. 521-48.

The whole passage about the word of God resembles a statement in the writings of Philo and was probably suggested to the writer by that statement. Philo speaks of the word "which cuts through everything, which being sharpened to the finest possible edge never ceases dividing all the objects of the outward senses, and when it has gone through them all and arrived at the things which are called atoms, then again this divider begins to separate from them the things which may be contemplated by the speculations of reason." Philo, however, confines its action to the intellectual sphere, while the author of Hebrews applies the idea to the moral realm.

In the phrase naked and open, the last word represents the translation of a very interesting Greek word, and the exact meaning of it is not very certain. The word means "to bend back the neck," and the reference is probably to a wrestler catching his opponent by the neck and pressing his head back so that it is exposed to the view of the heavens.

14-16. Main Theme of the Epistle Broached. (Continued in 51-10.) The writer now approaches the main theme of the Epistle, which has already been hinted at in 217 and 31, the highpriesthood of Christ Jesus; 414-16 is a transition paragraph linking the sermon on "the rest of God" to the commencement of the comparison between the work of an ordinary high priest to that of Christ which forms the theme of the opening section of ch. 5.

The transition paragraph describes Jesus as a great high priest who hath passed through the heavens. By this phrase the writer indicates that the distance which separated the ordinary high priest from God has been transcended by Christ. He has passed through the heavens into the immediate presence of God. All barriers have been broken down. The gulf between heaven and earth has been bridged and complete communion with God established. But this is not the only characteristic of the highpriesthood of Christ. If, on the one hand, there is perfect communion with God, there is, on the other hand, equally complete identity with the human race. Our High Priest is not one who is incapable of sympathizing with our frailty, since he has lived our life and has been tempted in all points as we are, though there is this difference between him and us: under pressure of temptation we often fall; he never fell. It is interesting to observe how the writer of Hebrews keeps the balance even between the human and the divine elements in the Person of Christ. No N.T. writer has a higher conception of the divinity of Christ and no N.T. writer attaches so much importance to the reality of his humanity. As in 2:17 the writer says that Christ ought in all points to be made like unto his brethren (see note), so here he emphasizes the fact that he was in all points tempted like as we are. The phrase in all points is of vital importance in both statements. The conflict with temptation was as acute in the experience of Jesus as it is in that of his followers. Jesus, to use Milton's fine phrase, "was no carpet knight who never sallied out and saw the foe." And if the victory over temptation from the start reduced the strain of the conflict for Jesus in some of its aspects, yet there are temptations connected with his high vocation which always, as in the wilderness, occasioned him anxiety and conflict. It is no meaningless phrase when Jesus says in Jn. 17:19, "For their sakes I consecrate (mg.) myself."

The paragraph ends with an appeal (v. 16). Seeing that we have a High Priest who is one with God and one with man, we must approach the throne of grace with confidence. The metaphor which the writer uses suggests the right of admission to a royal presence or the court of a supreme judge. Jesus has obtained for us the privilege of direct access to the Father, and this privilege is one which Christians ought to use to the full. The object of the approach is defined in a twofold way. First, that we may obtain mercy—which is the fundamental and primary need of the human soul; and, secondly, that we may obtain grace to help us in our time of need. The latter phrase must be interpreted in the light of the circumstances and conditions under which these Christians were living at the time, e.g., the persecutions, and the temptations to drift back to the life of the world.

CHAPTER V

1-10. The Qualifications and Characteristics of the Work of the High Priest. (See also 4:14-16.) In later chapters the writer develops at some length the points of contrast between the work of the ordinary high priest and the work of Christ (cf. ch. 10), but in this paragraph, which opens the discussion, he dwells upon the points of similarity rather than the points of difference. Stress is laid upon two main qualifications which are necessary in every high priest. (1) The high priest must be sympathetic and humane (vv. 2 and 3). (2) He must be divinely appointed (v. 4). It is then proved that Jesus possessed both these qualifications in a supreme degree (vv. 7-10).

1-3. The First Qualification. The first qualification for the office of high priest is described in vv. 1-3. The significant clause is found in v. 2, who can bear gently with the ignorant and erring, for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity. It is this clause which forms the link between this paragraph and the preceding. Christ was tempted in all points, and so was able to sympathize with our frailty. The high priest is compassed with infirmity and so is able to bear gently with the ignorant and erring. There is a point, of course, at which the resemblance breaks down. Christ is without sin. The high priest is bound as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins. Forbearance, therefore, is a quality common to both Christ and the earthly high priest. But, as is plainly implied in the phrasing, the forbearance is not extended to flagrant and willful sin but is shown, rather, to the ignorant and the erring, i.e., to those who fall into sin through ignorance. The Epistle shows infinite sympathy with the tempted soul and with the sin of ignorance, but it denounces in unmeasured terms flagrant and willful transgression. For the former it has unstinted sympathy, for the latter the most fiery denunciation.

5, 6. The Second Qualification. The high priest is not self-appointed. He derives his authority and his office from God. Even Aaron owed his appointment to a direct divine call. The highpriesthood of Christ is equally divine in its origin. Two proof-texts are cited to establish the argument. The first is from Psa. 27 and has already been used by the writer in 1:5. The second is of much greater importance, and plays a very significant part in the later argument of the Epistle (cf. ch. 7). It is taken from Psa. 110:4: Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. For the writer's interpretation of these words see note on 7:1.

7-10. The Manner in Which Christ Fulfilled These Qualifications. Once more the writer returns to one of his favorite themes and points out again how the experiences and suffering of Jesus during his earthly life fitted him for his highpriestly work. In the days of his flesh (i.e., during his earthly life) Jesus offered up prayers and supplications with bitter cries and tears to Him who was able to save him from death, and was heard because of his godly piety. The reference here is undoubtedly to the agony in the garden of Gethsemane (Mt. 26:36-46 and parallels). The intensity of the struggle in the mind of Jesus is revealed in the phrase, with strong crying and tears. The statement that the prayer of Jesus was heard is difficult in view of the fact that it remained unanswered. Some scholars translate the phrase, "He was heard so as to be delivered from fear," though this is not the most natural meaning of the Greek words. It is better to assume that the real answer to the prayer consisted in the endowment of Jesus with strength to meet his fate. The crisis of Gethsemane is cited as a new illustration of the manner in which Jesus identified himself with the life of humanity.

Vv. 8 and 9 indicate the function of the sufferings which Jesus endured in his being equipped for the work of salvation. Though he was Son, yet he learned obedience from the things he suffered, and having been perfected by them, he became the author of salvation (see note on 2¹⁰). Finally, in v. 10 the writer restates what he has already said in v. 6, that the claim of Jesus to be the true High Priest rests upon the fact that he belongs to the order of Melchizedek.

Another Digression: A Warning and an Encouragement. At this point the writer breaks away from the main line of his argument and enters upon another digression—an admonition which extends from 5¹¹ to 6²⁰. This great admonition, as it may be called, falls into the following divisions: (1) The peril of stagnation, 5¹¹–6³. (2) The peril of lapsing from the faith, 6⁴–8. (3) A message of encouragement and hope, 6⁹–12. (4) The faithfulness of God illustrated from his dealings with Abraham, 6¹³–20.

11–14. The Peril of Stagnation. (See also 6¹–3.) The writer begins by stating the motive for the digression. He has much to say about Melchizedek and he admits that his argument will be difficult to follow. He is afraid that the people to whom he is writing will not be able to appreciate his line of reasoning because they have become stagnant in thought and life. They are dull of hearing. They ought by this time themselves to have become teachers, whereas they still need someone to teach them the rudimentary principles of the Christian faith. They require a diet fit for infants; they cannot assimilate the food of full-grown men. They are still babes and have not yet been sufficiently disciplined to be able to distinguish instinctively between good and evil. The writer then proceeds at the beginning of ch. 6 to describe these elementary principles which formed the basis of Christian faith and practice in the first century. They consisted in: (1) Repentance and faith in God. These represented the moral demands made upon the believer. (2) Teaching about baptisms and the laying on of hands, i.e., about Christian rites and ceremonies. The plural baptisms (6²) is meant to cover other kinds of baptism besides that practiced by the Christian Church—e.g., Jewish and pagan, and the phrase, teaching about baptisms, means instruction in the difference between the Christian form of baptism and other types. (3) The doctrine of the resurrection and eternal judgment. These three groups give us the characteristic features of the minimum demands made by the Christian Church on its members.

The writer appeals to his readers to develop out of the minimum into the maximum stage of Christianity. Let us press on to perfection. His protest in this passage is mainly against the intellectual stagnation which prevented Christians from a full appreciation and understanding of Christian truth.

CHAPTER VI

1–3. See under 5¹¹–14.

4–8. The Peril of Lapsing From the Faith.

This is one of the most difficult and perplexing paragraphs in the Epistle. The writer seems to state in the most categorical way that the condition of those who have lapsed from the Christian faith is hopeless and there is no possibility of their restoration. When men have once been enlightened, it is argued, and have tasted of the heavenly gift and have become partakers of the Spirit, and have tasted the good word of God and the powers of the world to come, and then have fallen away, it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance, since they crucify the Son of God afresh and put him to open shame.

Many attempts have been made to soften the harshness of the passage. (1) Some scholars, observing that the Greek word translated to renew them is in a different tense from the other verbs in the passage, have sought to find relief by giving it the meaning "to keep on renewing." It is impossible to keep up the process of renewing those who have fallen away. A single lapse may admit of recovery, but repeated lapses make it impossible. (2) Another method is to apply the same principle to the participial phrase, crucifying the Son of God afresh, and to argue that the use of the present tense in the Greek denotes continuous action. "It is impossible to renew those who have fallen away while they continue to crucify the Son of God afresh."

There is some justification on linguistic grounds for each of these suggestions; and if this passage stood alone, it would be possible to find a way out of the difficulty by adopting one or the other of them. But in 10²⁶ the doctrine is restated in a form which admits of neither of these methods of escape: "If we sin willfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more a sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful expectation of judgment."

Nor can we evade the difficulty of stressing with Westcott the word repentance and arguing that as repentance involves "a complete change of mind consequent upon the apprehension of the true moral nature of things," it follows necessarily "that in this large sense there can be no 'second' repentance."

We must look in another direction for the real explanation of the severity of the passage. It appears to be an exaggeration of a very common psychological experience. Everybody knows that cases of relapse are very difficult to deal with. When the religious emotion has once been aroused and then has died down, it is very difficult—often it seems quite impossible—to kindle it afresh. John Wesley says in his Journal, "From the terrible instances I have met with in all parts of England, I am more and more convinced the devil himself desires nothing more than this, that the people of any place should be half awakened and then left to themselves to go to sleep again." And on another occasion he writes: "I was more than ever convinced that the preaching like an apostle, without joining together those that are awakened and training them in the ways of God, is only begetting children for the murderer. . . . The consequence is that nine in ten of the once awakened are faster asleep than ever."

The experience of John Wesley must have been common in the apostolic age. The problem of the lapsed baffled the heart and the intellect of the church. What wonder is it that the writer of the Epistle drew from his own bitter experience the theological inference that the restoration of the lapsed was an impossibility! His statement is a generalization—perhaps a too absolute generalization—from the experience of the church. Psychologically the statement is in accordance with almost universal experience, but whether the author of Hebrews was justified in hardening a psychological fact into a theological proposition may be regarded as, at any rate, open to question.

The writer concludes the paragraph by an illustration taken from nature (vv. 7 and 8). Fertile land which absorbs the rain and produces fruit receives a blessing from God; but if it only produces thorns and thistles, it is rejected and comes nigh to being cursed—its doom is to be burned. Compare with this the words of Jesus in Mt. 7:17-19.

9-12. A Message of Encouragement and Hope. Lest the terrible words of the preceding paragraph should discourage and dismay his readers, the writer now proceeds to reassure and comfort them. Though we have found it necessary, he argues, to describe the doom of the lapsed, we are confident that such a fate as that will never befall you. God will never forget your service and the love you have shown and are still showing in ministering to the needs of his saints. It is our keen desire that you will show equal eagerness in realizing the full meaning of the Christian hope and follow the example of those who through their steadfast faith inherit the promises of God. For a further explanation of the record of the service rendered by these Christians, see 10³²⁻³⁴.

13-20. The Faithfulness of God and the Promises Which He Made to Abraham. The word promise is the link which connects this paragraph with what goes before. The phrase in v. 12, "those who inherit the promises," suggests the idea of the inviolability of the promises of God. We have not merely our own steadfastness and resolution to rely upon as the guarantee of victory: behind all this stands the promise of God which cannot be broken.

The particular promise referred to is contained in Gen. 22¹⁶, 17. There are two points in these words which the writer emphasizes; first the promise itself and then the oath by which it is assured. Among men it is customary in making a promise to call upon some higher power to bear witness that they have sworn to carry out their bond. The oath sets its seal upon the promise and makes it binding and secure. When once the oath has been taken, it means that God has been called in as a party to the transaction, and that assurance has been made doubly sure, since any breach of the contract would now involve despite against God. Now, God in making this promise to Abraham had no higher power that he could call in as witness. He therefore interposed with an oath (v. 17), and swore by himself. The Christian hope, therefore, is doubly attested. It is attested, in the first place, by the solemn promise itself, and then by the oath which God himself added to the promise to make it still more secure. Both promise and oath alike are immutable and inviolable, and these two immutable things (v. 18) guarantee the hope and make it absolutely secure (cf. the argument in 7²¹). Christians, like refugees from a hostile world, have laid hold of this hope—and it has become an anchor (v. 19) which keeps them unmoved amid all the storms that sweep down upon them. But the anchor of hope has not merely value for the life that now is. Christians stand as it were between two worlds—the present world and the world that is to come. Over the world that is to come there hangs a veil which hides it from our eyes. But the anchor of the Christian hope penetrates the veil and is fastened sure and firm upon the other side. We are anchored not in time but in eternity. But even that does not cover all that we possess in the other world. Jesus too has passed beyond the veil and entered into the life beyond, and where he has gone we shall follow, since he is but the forerunner.

We have therefore two pledges to guarantee our inheritance: (1) The anchor of hope based upon the immutable promise of God; (2) the presence of Christ, “the firstborn among many brethren,” in the land behind the veil. At this point with a skillful turn of the sentence the writer steers our thought out of the backwater into the main stream of the argument of the Epistle by adding the words having become a high priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

CHAPTER VII

Christ the Ideal High Priest After the Order of Melchizedek. The writer now resumes the argument which he had dropped in 5¹⁰, and it is at this point that the line of thought becomes involved and complicated for the modern student. What is the point in the comparison which the writer makes between Christ and Melchizedek? The question can only be answered by recalling to mind the main problem which the Epistle is facing. If we have in the Jewish Law a divine revelation and a divinely appointed priesthood to act as a mediator between man and God, what need is there of anything more? Why do we require another high priest? What room is there left for the highpriestly office of Christ? It is exactly the same problem which in a different aspect Paul found himself compelled to grapple with in Romans and Galatians. The common belief in the finality of the Jewish Law as the expression of the will of God was a serious difficulty for his doctrine of justification by faith. In meeting this fundamental objection to the Christian position Paul and the author of Hebrews adopt the same method of reply. They both attempt to go back behind the Law to the religion of the patriarchal age. Paul appeals to the faith of Abraham, the author of Hebrews to the priesthood of Melchizedek. The assumption of both is that the ideal religion is to be found in the age of the patriarchs and that the Mosaic law represented a declension from that ideal. The golden age of Israel lies in the most primitive period and subsequent history involved a gradual falling away from that high standard. Christianity represented the recovery of the faith of the golden age which had been submerged under the legalism of later times. The task of Paul, however, was far easier than that of the author of Hebrews. He could take his stand on the faith of Abraham, who was universally recognized as the father of the Jewish race, and whose religion might easily be regarded as the prototype of the Christian doctrine of justification by faith. The author of Hebrews could find only one example of a priest in the golden age, and that was Melchizedek. He was not the first, however, to make the discovery. The author of Psa. 110 had already discovered Melchizedek and had spoken of him as the representative of the ideal priesthood, and had said that the Messiah when he came would belong to the type of Melchizedek and not to the type of the ordinary Levitical priests.

But the author of Psa. 110 and the writer of Hebrews had very little basis in fact for the ideal portrait which they draw of Melchizedek. Melchizedek appears on the stage of history for only one brief moment and plays what seems to be a minor part in the record of the life of Abraham. All that is known about him is told in three verses (Gen. 14¹⁸⁻²⁰): “And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine: and he was priest of God Most High. And he blessed him, and said, Blessed be Abram of God Most High, possessor of heaven and earth: and blessed be God Most High, which hath delivered thine enemies into thy hand. And he [i.e., Abram] gave him a tenth of all.” Such are the scanty facts which underlie the ideal picture of Melchizedek in Psa. 110 and in Hebrews. The argument in both is that Melchizedek represents the heavenly ideal of the priesthood which degenerated in the Aaronic system and was recovered by Christ.

The analysis of the argument of ch. 7 falls into the following divisions: (1) The portrait of Melchizedek and its significance for religion (vv. 1-3). (2) The relation between Melchizedek and Abraham, proving the superiority of the former (vv. 4-10). (3) The inferiority of the Levitical priesthood (v. 11-17). (4) The superseding of the Levitical priesthood by Christ (vv. 18-25). (5) Christ as the ideal High Priest (vv. 26-28).

1-3. The Portrait of Melchizedek and Its Significance for Religion. The writer begins by stating the facts derived from Gen. 14, and then he proceeds to develop and expand the facts by means of etymology and allegory. First of all he takes the name "Melchizedek" itself and points out that the word means king of righteousness, and then he takes the word "Salem" and says that it means peace. In this way he clothes the figure of Melchizedek with the great and divine attributes of peace and righteousness. Then, in v. 3, he makes a very remarkable use of the argument from silence. Nothing is said in Genesis about the parentage of Melchizedek. We are not told anything about his father or his mother. There is no reference to the beginning of his life or to its end—to his birth or to his death. Since, therefore, in the view of the writer the silences of Scripture are as significant as its statements, he concludes that Melchizedek is a kind of divine figure (like unto the Son of God) without human origin and existing eternally. And here we must not forget the Platonic background that lies behind the writer's thought (see p. 1296). Melchizedek represents the divine archetype of the idea of priesthood, which broke into human history in his person in the patriarchal age, was eclipsed by the Levitical system, and finally was recovered by Christ. In Christ there is a return to the ideal.

The allegorical method which the writer employs in his interpretation of scripture, and the unrestrained use he makes of it in the deductions which he draws from its silences and omissions, leave the modern mind unconvinced. But we must remember that the Epistle was written in the first century and not in the twentieth, and the writer is only doing what many of his contemporaries, pagan as well as Christian, did in their treatment of sacred literature. Paul uses a similar form of allegory in making Hagar and Sarah types of the Law and of the gospel in Gal. 4:21-31. As a matter of fact, the N.T. is much more restrained in its use of allegory than Philo or the later Alexandrian Fathers.

4-10. The Relations Between Melchizedek and Abraham. The writer now proceeds to demonstrate the superiority of Melchizedek to Abraham. Abraham was universally regarded as the founder of the Jewish race. The Jews looked back to him as the father and fountainhead of their national greatness. It was a daring argument to attempt to prove that he had any superior in the patriarchal period, but our author does not hesitate in making the assumption. He fixes upon the phrase in Genesis, "And he [i.e., Abraham] gave him a tenth of all," and argues that these words imply that Abraham recognized his own inferiority to Melchizedek. Consider, he says, how great this man was, unto whom Abraham, the patriarch, gave a tenth out of the chief spoils (v. 4). "It is quite true," he proceeds to argue, "that the sons of Levi who hold the priestly office have the right under the Law to exact tithes from the rest of the people, though they, like themselves, are also the children of Abraham." But this man Melchizedek, who did not belong to the Levitical order of priests and who therefore had no such right in law, exacted tithes from Abraham and pronounced a benediction on the great patriarch who was the possessor of the divine promise. Now, a benediction is always pronounced by a superior over an inferior. Hence it follows that Melchizedek must have been greater than Abraham. But there is another difference between Melchizedek and the priests of the Levitical order. They are mortal men, but Melchizedek is one of the immortals, since the statement is made about him that "he lives." There is no record of this in the Genesis narrative, but the writer is referring to the deduction which he has drawn in v. 3 from the silence of Genesis, having neither beginning of days nor end of life.

Then follows, in v. 9, a very subtle line of reasoning. Melchizedek exacted tithes from Abraham: but Abraham is the father of the tribes of Israel and among them of the tribe of Levi. It may be argued, therefore, that in the person of Abraham their forefather the Levitical priests paid tribute and tithe to Melchizedek. Because Melchizedek is superior to Abraham, he is superior also to his descendants and for the same reason. Hence it follows that the type of priesthood represented by Melchizedek is of a higher order than that represented by the sons of Levi.

11-17. The Inferiority of the Levitical Priesthood. There is yet another argument which proves the inferiority of the Levitical system. It has shown itself to be a failure. It did not secure perfection for men. If it had been adequate, there would have been no need for the psalmist to proclaim the rise of a new order. The words which the 110th psalm applies to the Messiah, "Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek," are a proof that there existed a deep-seated conviction that the Levitical priesthood had never achieved the purpose for which it had been established. It had proved itself incapable of securing victory over sin and the sense of a full communion with God. And the failure of the priesthood meant the failure of the entire legal system, for the Levitical priesthood was the heart and core of the Jewish Law. Under it hath the people received the law; i.e., the Jewish code as a whole had grown up around the central fact of the priesthood. The need, therefore, of a new order of priesthood involved a revolutionary change in the whole legal system. The Law depended for its validity and efficacy upon the success of its priesthood, and when the priesthood failed, the whole system became obsolete and useless.

In vv. 13, 14 the writer seems to be replying to a criticism that might be brought against his line of reasoning. "Granted," the objector seems to say, "that your argument is sound and that the failure of the existing Levitical system is proved, why on that account should the whole of the Law be discredited? Why should there not be a reformation in the Levitical system? Why should not a new and better order of priests arise under the legal system?" In reply to this challenge the writer asserts that the facts are against such a theory. The psalmist does not speak of a reformed Levitical system but of the rise of an ideal priest who did not spring from the tribe of Levi at all but belonged to the order of Melchizedek. And Christ himself, who in his own person has fulfilled the prophecy of the psalmist, came out of the tribe of Judah, and the tribe of Judah, according to the Law, has no connection whatever with the priesthood. The credentials of the Levitical priest are based simply upon genealogy. He must be in the true tribal succession. His official rank depends entirely upon his fulfillment of the demands of an external (this is what the word carnal in v. 16 really means in this connection) commandment. The credentials of Jesus are very different. They are displayed in his power of an indissoluble (or endless) life. It is upon the fact of his resurrection, and the proof which it afforded that his life was indestructible, that the claim of Jesus to be the real fulfillment of the psalmist's prophecy really rests. The psalmist had declared that the ideal high priest would be forever—and only one whose life could not be destroyed by death could be said to answer to the psalmist's ideal.

18-25. The Superseding of the Levitical System by Christ. It follows from the argument of the previous paragraph that since the whole Law is involved in the failure of the priesthood, it is now repealed and canceled. It has proved itself futile and so there has been a disannulling of a foregoing commandment (v. 18). It has been shown by experience to be weak and profitless. It could not achieve the purpose for which it was set up. It could not produce moral perfection. Therefore it has now been superseded, and a new era has been opened for us. In contrast to the sense of despair which the Law created in the minds of men, the new era is described as the era of hope; and its supreme characteristic is to be found in the fact that it does what the Law could never do—it enables men to draw nigh unto God. There are two points in which the superiority of the Priesthood of Christ to the Levitical system can be demonstrated:

(1) By means of an argument similar to that which he has used in 6¹³⁻¹⁸, the writer shows by elaborating the statement of Psalms 110 that the priesthood of Christ rests upon the solemn oath of God. The Lord swears and will not repent. There is no such basis to be found for the Levitical system (v. 21). The reason why the divine asseveration was made in the case of Christ is to be found in the fact that he is the surety of a better covenant. This is the first introduction of the idea of the new covenant which is subsequently developed in ch. 8. (2) The second argument (v. 23, 24) is an expansion of the phrase, the power of an endless life, which the writer has already used in v. 16. The argument has two phases. (a) The Levitical priests are an innumerable host. They are always changing. There is no permanence about them. We Christians have a single Mediator. (b) The Levitical priests are mortal men. They are subject to death. They do not abide and consequently their office and work are transitory. Christ, on the other hand, is immortal, and his work is therefore permanent and uninterrupted. He is able, therefore, to provide the most complete salvation for us, since he is alive for evermore and is able to make continual intercession for us. The phrase translated to the uttermost is of uncertain meaning. It may have a temporal significance and mean "for all time," but probably the R.V. mg. is right in translating the phrase completely. The saving power of Christ covers the whole range of human life and no sphere of conduct is outside the scope of its influence. The means by which this salvation is secured is the continuous intercession of Christ. A similar idea is found in Rom. 8²⁶, where Paul, speaking of the Holy Spirit, says, "He maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered."

26-28. Christ as the Ideal High Priest. In the final section of the chapter the writer summarizes the arguments by which he has sought to prove that Christ is the ideal High Priest. His credentials are thus described: (1) The perfection of his character. He is holy, guileless, undefiled. The Levitical priests hold their office by right of descent; Christ by right of his own innate purity. Compare with this statement of the sinlessness of Christ the words of 1 Pet. 222. (2) He is free from all contact with sinful men. The Levitical high priest spent the week before the Day of Atonement in isolation in the Temple, that he might be untainted by contact with sin when he offered the sacrifice. It is in this sense that the phrase is here used of Christ. (3) He has been made higher than the heavens. This phrase explains the words separated from sinners. Jesus has entered into the highest heaven and so his separation from sinners is complete. According to the common belief of the time, there was a series of seven heavens, each higher than the one below it. It was in the highest heaven of all that God had his dwelling place, so the phrase made higher than the heavens means that Christ had passed through the lower heavens into the very presence of God himself.

Then the writer proceeds in vv. 27 and 28 to recapitulate the points of contrast between Christ and the Levitical priests. The high priests needed to offer a daily sacrifice both for their own sins and those of the people. Christ offered a single sacrifice once for all, and it possesses eternal efficiency. There is a difficulty in the first half of the statement. According to the O.T., the high priest sacrificed a sin-offering for the people only once a year and, judging from the references in other parts of the Epistle (97-25 101), the writer was perfectly familiar with the fact. Why then does he state here that there was a daily offering? It is true, according to Lev. 619-23, that there was a daily offering, but this is a cereal offering and was not intended to be an offering for sin. Possibly the writer had this enactment in his mind and put a larger interpretation upon it than the words of Leviticus warrant. Philo also assumes that there was a daily offering made by the high priest, and this may be one of the cases in which the writer agrees with Philo (with whose writings he was undoubtedly familiar) against the text of the O.T. Another suggestion is that the word daily means "yearly on a definite day," but this seems too farfetched to be a true interpretation. Westcott thinks that the word daily applies not to the high priests but to Jesus and his continuous intercession. But this idea seems to be in flagrant contradiction to the phrase, this he did once for all, when he offered up himself. It is perhaps best to say with Moffatt that "the writer blends loosely in his description the annual sacrifice of the high priest on Atonement-day and the daily sacrifice offered by the high priests." In the last phrase in v. 27 the writer, as is his wont, introduces for the first time a new idea, that Christ offered sacrifice once for all, which he develops later in ch. 10. In v. 28 he emphasizes again the superiority of the prophecy in Psa. 110 to the Levitical system.

CHAPTER VIII

The writer has proved in ch. 7 that Christ is the ideal High Priest, and he now proceeds to argue that the sphere in which he exercises his office is an ideal and heavenly sanctuary. And thus he becomes the Mediator of a new and better covenant. The chapter, therefore, falls into two divisions: (1) The heavenly sanctuary (vv. 1-5). (2) The new covenant (vv. 6-13).

1-5. The Heavenly Sanctuary. There is a difficulty in the opening statement. Now in the things which we are saying the chief point is this. This sentence as it is translated seems to imply that the writer is about to recapitulate the main points in his previous arguments. As a matter of fact, however, he proceeds to develop an entirely new idea. It is probable that the true interpretation of the opening clause is this: "The climax of what we have already said is as follows." The reference is to the clause in 726, "made higher than the heavens." The expansion of the idea involved in the statement is made in vv. 1, 2, where it is stated that Christ as the ideal High Priest took his appointed seat on the right hand of the throne of God and became the minister of the ideal sanctuary in heaven. Here we have the emergence of a new movement in the thought of the Epistle. Christ is not only the ideal High Priest, but he exercises his office not in any earthly sanctuary but in the ideal sanctuary in the heavens. The argument throughout this paragraph is based on the Platonic conception that everything on earth has its heavenly counterpart (see p. 1296a).

The true tabernacle, which the Lord pitched, not man, refers to the ideal sanctuary in heaven, which is the counterpart of the earthly tabernacle (v. 2). The ministry which Jesus exercised in the heavenly temple is higher than that of the Levitical order. Even in the heavenly sanctuary some kind of an offering is needed to establish communion between God and man. Every high priest is appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices (v. 3)—the ideal high priest must therefore have an offering to make. Here the writer drops a preliminary hint of the great theme which he develops in ch. 9, where he describes the ideal sacrifice which the ideal high priest offers in the ideal sanctuary. But in the present passage the idea is introduced merely as part of the general argument. Assuming that sacrifice is essential to the work of a high priest, the offering that Christ made is different from the sacrifices offered under the Levitical system. Christ does not belong to the Levitical system at all, and would not have any right at all to exercise a Levitical ministry on earth, since he is not a member of the Levitical order. But this does not in the least degree detract from the value of the sacrifice which he actually made. The Levitical priests minister in an earthly tabernacle which is only a copy and shadow of the heavenly things (v. 5). The derivative and inferior nature of the earthly tabernacle is proved by an appeal to the words of Ex. 2540: "See that thou make them after their pattern, which hath been shewed thee in the mount." God is here represented as showing Moses in a vision the ideal sanctuary in the heavens and telling him to use it as a model for the construction of the earthly tabernacle. The same line of thought is found in the Book of Wisdom (98). "Thou gavest command to build a sanctuary in thy holy mountain, and an altar in the city of thy habitation, a copy of the holy tabernacle which thou preparedst aforehand from the beginning."

The metaphor of the shadow goes back in its origin to Plato's famous parable of the cave-dwellers in the seventh book of the Republic. In this parable Plato pictures mankind shut up in a kind of dungeon or cave with their faces turned to the wall at the back and so fixed that they are unable to move them round. Across the front of the cave figures are continually passing but all the prisoners can see are the shadows which their forms cast upon the wall on which their gaze is set. If the prisoners were released and taken out of the cave, their eyes would be blinded with excess of light. The parable is easy to read. Mankind dwells in the prison-house of sense, and sees only the shadows and reflections of the true realities under conditions of time and space. Plato's parable represents exactly the position taken up by the writer of Hebrews.

Under the covenant of the O.T. men lived in the land of shadows, seeing only the inferior earthly copies of the heavenly realities. Christ has brought them out of the cave of shadows and given them the great realities. A similar argument is used in 923 and 101.

6-13. The New Covenant. It follows from what has been said that there is a radical difference between the Levitical system of the O.T. and the work of Jesus Christ. In the work of Christ we pass from the realm of shadows into the world of reality, and he may be said, therefore, to have established a new covenant between God and man. This new covenant is superior to the old because the divine promises upon which it rests are superior to those which formed the basis of the Levitical system. The better promises are described in the quotation from Jeremiah which follows. But what right have we to speak about the institution of a new relationship between God and man? What right have we to pass judgment upon the divine revelation contained in the Jewish Law? What right have we to speak of it as superseding? In reply to questions such as these, the writer advances one of the most adroit and skillful arguments in the Epistle. The O.T. itself bears witness to the failure of the Jewish Law. God himself pronounced judgment upon it when he gave Jeremiah the promise of a new covenant. If the first covenant had been above all criticism, there would have been no room for a second. All through the divine promise to Jeremiah there runs the note of criticism on the old order. In passing judgment upon the Jewish Law, therefore, and challenging its finality, we are only doing what God himself has done. We claim that the new covenant prophesied by Jeremiah has been fulfilled in the new relationship established between God and man by Jesus Christ.

The quotation is taken from Jer. 3131-34 and follows the LXX version, though, except in one clause, this is in substantial agreement with the Hebrew. The one difference occurs in the clause in v. 9, And I regarded them not, saith the Lord, where the Hebrew reads, "although I was a husband to them, saith the Lord." Some question has been raised by modern scholars as to whether the quotation forms an authentic part of the prophecy of Jeremiah (the issue is discussed by Peake in the Century Bible edition of Jeremiah, vol. ii, pp. 101-103), but this is quite irrelevant to our present purpose, as the passage formed undoubtedly an integral part of Jeremiah at the time when this Epistle was written.

The main points in the quotation are: (1) The introductory words in which the writer describes the reproach of God against the people of Israel (v. 8). (2) The divine promise to establish a new covenant with the nation (v. 8). (3) The new covenant will differ in character from the old covenant established after the release of the Israelites from Egypt (v. 9). (4) The character of the new covenant (vv. 10, 11). The old covenant was external. It was written on tables of stone. The new covenant will be inscribed on the heart. Moreover, the old covenant was made with the nation as a whole: the new covenant will embrace individuals. The result will be that the knowledge of God will become universal. All shall know me, from the least to the greatest of them. (5) In consequence of this new attitude to God on the part of the people, he will blot out their transgressions (v. 12.)

The concluding verse of the chapter (v. 13) summarizes the argument. The fact that God speaks of the covenant as new implies that the former covenant is out of date and antiquated. And because it is out of date and antiquated it is now on the verge of decay. The O.T., therefore, contains within itself a prophecy that it is to be superseded by something higher and greater.

CHAPTER IX

The writer now proceeds to demonstrate the third point in his main theme. He has already shown that Christ is the ideal High Priest exercising his ministry in an ideal sanctuary. He now sets out to prove that he offered the ideal or perfect sacrifice. The chapter falls naturally into the following sections: (1) A description of the earthly tabernacle (vv. 1-5). (2) The fatal defects of its worship (vv. 6-10). (3) The ideal sacrifice offered by Christ (vv. 11-14). (4) The necessity and value of that sacrifice (vv. 15-22). (5) The relation between the ideal sacrifice and the ideal sanctuary (vv. 23-28).

1-5. The Description of the Earthly Tabernacle. The contrast between the old and new covenants is developed in the account which is now given of the tabernacle which is called a sanctuary of this world in contrast to the heavenly sanctuary which was the scene of the ministry of Christ.

It was not because it lacked the means of worship that the old covenant failed. On the contrary, the tabernacle was magnificently equipped with the most exquisite and ornate furnishings. It contained (1) the candlestick, i.e., a golden lamp-stand with seven lamps (Ex. 2531-40), which stood in front of the sacred table. (2) The table itself (Ex. 2523-30). It was made of acacia wood overlaid with pure gold and with a golden crown around it. (3) The shewbread, literally, bread of the setting forth (Ex. 2530 Lev. 245-9). The shewbread consisted of twelve cakes which were set out in two rows on the table of the Lord. Only Aaron and his sons were allowed to eat these sacred cakes, though on one occasion (1 Sam. 214-6), which is referred to by Jesus (Mk. 226), David, when he and his men were hungry, ate "the shewbread, which it is not lawful to eat save for the priests, and gave also to them that were with him." Such was the furniture of the first division of the tabernacle known as the holy place.

The holy place was separated by a veil (Ex. 2631-33) from the more sacred part of the tabernacle, which is called "the Holy of Holies" and is the innermost sanctuary. The contents of the holy of holies are enumerated as follows: (1) The golden censer. There is some doubt, however, whether this is an accurate translation of the Greek word, which may also mean "the altar of incense." As there is no reference to a golden censer in the O.T. most modern scholars think that the marginal reading of the R.V., "altar of incense," is to be preferred. There is a difficulty, however, in this theory because the altar of incense belonged to the holy place and not to the holy of holies (Ex. 3725-29). To minimize the difficulty which thus arises some scholars argue that the phrasing of Hebrews, the holy of holies having a golden altar of incense, need not imply that the altar was placed in the holy of holies, but may simply mean that the altar was the means of approach to the inner sanctuary. It is interesting to note that the author of Hebrews is not the only writer who connects the altar with the holy of holies. It is definitely placed in the holy of holies by the Apocalypse of Baruch. Very possibly there were two distinct traditions with regard to the location of the altar. (2) The ark of the covenant (Ex. 2510-12) was a box made of acacia wood and covered with gold both outside and inside. (3) A golden pot holding manna (Ex. 1632-35). This was a memorial of the gift of manna in the wilderness, "that they may see the bread wherewith I fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt." (4) Aaron's rod that budded (Num. 171-10), which was a symbol that the priesthood belonged to the tribe of Levi. (5) The tables of the covenant (Deut. 102-8), i.e., the tables of stone on which the commandments were written. (6) The cherubim of glory over the mercy-seat (Ex. 2517-22). The mercy-seat was the lid of the ark, and was a square slab made of wood. It was sprinkled with blood on the day of atonement, and hence it obtained its name "means of propitiation" (this is the literal interpretation of the Greek word), or mercy-seat. The cherubim were two winged figures placed on each side of the ark. They symbolized the presence of God, and the mercy-seat indicated his compassion and readiness to forgive sin.

The contents of the tabernacle were, therefore, rich in meaning, but the writer of Hebrews says that it is impossible for him to discuss the significance of the symbolism.

6-10. The Defects of the Tabernacle from a Religious Point of View. But in spite of the wealth of its equipment and the rich symbolism connected with it, the tabernacle was seriously defective. It failed to establish a real communion between man and God. This becomes evident when we consider the arrangements which were made for worship. There were two types: (1) the worship connected with the holy place, (2) the worship connected with the holy of holies. The holy place is the scene of ordinary worship. The priests enter it regularly day by day to offer the ordinary sacrifices. But the inner shrine—the holy of holies—is only entered once a year by the high priest who makes blood offerings both for his own personal sins and for those of the people. The word translated errors (v. 7) is a special term and denotes sins of ignorance—sins which have been committed unwittingly. This arrangement was ordained by the Holy Spirit (v. 8) to show that there was no free access into the presence of God under the order of worship connected with the tabernacle. The right of approach was confined to the high priest on one solitary occasion in the year. Moreover, the arrangement is a kind of parable which is intended to teach us a lesson (v. 9), and the lesson is this: The gifts and sacrifices offered by the priests cannot possibly make the conscience of the worshippers perfect, since they are external ordinances and do not therefore affect the inner spirit of men, because they only deal with questions of food and drink and actual washings. They have, therefore, only a temporary value and have been imposed until a time of reformation, i.e., until the new covenant with its new order is established.

The point of the paragraph is this: The Jewish Law broke down on two fundamental issues. One purpose of religion is to secure access to God, and Judaism failed in achieving this end, since it only provided for a rare and occasional communion on the part of the high priest alone. Another purpose of religion is to discover the means of moral regeneration. And here too Judaism failed, since its regulations and ordinances were little more than external acts of ritual and never touched the conscience and the inner life. Judaism, therefore, is a temporary makeshift, not a final religion.

11-14. The Ideal Sacrifice Offered by Christ. The writer now proceeds to show how Christ has made good the defects in the Jewish Law. As Moffatt puts it, "Christ came on the scene and all was changed." He became the High Priest of the happier age (the good things) that was to be. It is a little uncertain (since the MSS. vary) whether the writer means "the happier age that was to be" or "the happier age which has now been realized." The same phrase occurs in 10¹, where the reference is unmistakably to the future, but that does not necessarily imply that the writer must have said the same thing here, as the words are used in a different context. Many scholars think that "the happier age which has now been realized" is what he wrote here. From the writer's standpoint the realization of the good things was no longer a future dream. It had already come to pass, and was the inheritance into which every Christian entered.

The writer now produces the facts which constitute his argument to prove that where Judaism failed, Christ had succeeded. His success was due to two things: (1) He entered into the heavenly sanctuary—not into the holy of holies of the tabernacle like an ordinary high priest, but into the ideal sanctuary in the heavens—a sanctuary not made with hands and not belonging to the world of created things. Many of the Christian Fathers took the phrase through the greater and more perfect tabernacle (v. 11) to refer to the perfection of the human nature of Christ (cf. 10²⁰), but it is very difficult to get this interpretation out of the text. The explanation given above is much more in line with the writer's general argument in this section of the Epistle. (2) He offered the perfect sacrifice—his own blood—and not an imperfect sacrifice like that of goats and calves. Moreover, this sacrifice which Christ offered needed no repetition like the sacrifices of the Jewish Law. It was offered once for all and wrought an eternal redemption. The effect produced by the sacrifice of Christ, therefore, transcended in value the sacrifices of the Jewish Law.

The writer of Hebrews does not deny that the ordinary sacrifices had a value of a kind. They sanctify unto the cleanness of the flesh (v. 13). In this phrase he refers to the type of sacrifice described in Num. 19. There were certain things, e.g., contact with a dead body, which rendered a man ceremonially unclean. The law of purification required that a red heifer should be slain and its blood sprinkled seven times toward the sanctuary. The body and blood of the beast were then burned with cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet wool. The ashes were mixed with water, and this was sprinkled on the body of the man who had been contaminated. But this rite affected only ceremonial uncleanness and merely cleansed the body. The sacrifice of Christ, however, was much more potent in its efficacy. It cleansed the conscience from dead works to serve the living God.

In v. 14 the writer gives the grounds upon which he attaches supreme value to the sacrifice offered by Christ. He assumes that sacrifice is an eternal necessity. He assumes also that the shedding of blood is essential to sacrifice. (Cf. the statement in v. 22, "apart from shedding of blood there is no remission.") These are the two postulates upon which his argument is built up. On the assumption that these postulates are true the writer argues as follows: (1) The value of the sacrifice of Christ rests upon the fact that he offered himself and not an external sacrifice. It was the surrender of his own life that counted. (2) This sacrifice fulfilled the condition that the offering must be without blemish since he was "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners." (3) It was offered through the eternal Spirit. There is some doubt as to the exact meaning of this phrase. The translation of the R.V. seems to suggest that by eternal Spirit the Holy Spirit is meant, but this is improbable owing to the phrasing of the words in the original Greek. It is generally assumed that the meaning of the phrase is identical with that of the words in 7:16, "after the power of an endless life." The efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ depended on the fact that he was not mortal, like an earthly priest, but possessed a spirit which was eternal. He belonged to an eternal order and his sacrifice therefore had eternal value.

15-22. The Necessity and Value of the Sacrifice of Christ. The argument in this paragraph is difficult to follow because there is a play on the Greek word translated covenant which it is not easy for an English reader to understand. The Greek word may mean either a covenant or a will or testament, and the writer passes from one to the other and bases his argument on both. He begins by emphasizing again the idea which is the theme of 8:6-13, that Christ is the Mediator of a new covenant.

But the making of a covenant does not necessitate a death. There is no mention of a sacrificial death, for instance, in Jeremiah's prophecy of the new covenant quoted in 8:8-12. And yet the writer of Hebrews regards the death of Christ as essential to the new covenant which he has established: A death having taken place for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant (v. 15). How can the necessity for this be proved? In two ways, argues the writer. (1) The word covenant also signifies a "will" or "testament," and a will only comes into force when the testator is dead (vv. 15-18). While the testator is still alive the will does not operate. So the death of Christ was necessary, in order that his testament might come into effect. (2) By a swift transition to the other meaning of the word (vv. 19-22), the writer argues that even the first covenant was dedicated by the shedding of blood. The reference is to the statement in Ex. 24:3-11. After sacrificing burnt-offerings of oxen unto the Lord, "Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basins; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the Lord hath spoken will we do, and be obedient. And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you." The writer seems to be quoting from memory, for he makes several additions to the narrative in Exodus. (1) He speaks of the sacrifice of goats, which are not mentioned in Exodus. (2) There is no reference in Exodus to water, scarlet wool, and hyssop. (3) It is not stated in Exodus that the book was sprinkled. But in spite of the variance in the details, the main point of the contention of Hebrews is fully proved—sacrifice was certainly used in the establishment of the first covenant. It is strange that the writer does not quote the words used by Jesus in the institution of the Lord's Supper, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:25), but it is in keeping with the absence of any distinct reference to the Eucharist in the Epistle.

The paragraph ends with a general statement. I may almost say, all things are cleansed with blood, and apart from shedding of blood there is no remission (v. 22). The writer qualifies his general statement by the phrase, I may almost say, because under the Jewish Law those who were too poor to offer animal sacrifice might be assured that their sins were remitted without it. With this qualification, however, the writer regards it as a fundamental axiom of religion that sacrifice is essential to the remission of sin.

23-28. The Relation Between the Ideal Sacrifice and the Ideal Sanctuary. The writer now returns to the Platonic argument which he has used with such cogency in 8:1,2 (note, and see p. 1296a). The earthly sanctuary which is a copy of the heavenly had necessarily to be cleansed by the sacrifices offered under the Jewish Law. But the heavenly sanctuary needed better sacrifices than these, because an ideal sanctuary demands an ideal form of sacrifice. The sanctuary of Christ is not like the earthly tabernacle which was made by human hands and was only a shadow and reflection of the heavenly reality. It was the heavenly sanctuary itself, and when he entered it he came into the very presence of God. But now another question emerges: What right have we to assume that the sacrifice of Christ was final and will never be repeated? Wherein does it differ in this respect from the sacrifice offered by the high priest which needed to be repeated every year? In this paragraph the writer attempts to answer the question, and he uses two arguments to prove that the sacrifice of Christ was final and complete. (1) It has been already stated in v. 15 that the sacrifice availed for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant. It covered, therefore, all the past, or else Christ must often have suffered since the foundation of the world. And if it covered all the past, it may be assumed that it will cover the future too. (2) Death comes only once to men. It is always the final issue of life. Christ too was subject to the same law. He could be subject to death only once. In the case of men death is followed by judgment; in the case of Christ by his reappearance on earth in triumph. Moreover, there is no time left for the repetition of the sacrifice in the future. Christ died at the end of the ages (v. 26), and the final consummation is near at hand. Like practically all the other N.T. writers, our author firmly believes in the speedy return of Christ (cf. 1037.38).

CHAPTER X

The discussion of ch. 9 is continued in ch. 10. The chapter contains the following divisions: (1) The failure of the Jewish sacrifices and the finality of the sacrifice of Christ proved by the prophecy in Psa. 40 (vv. 1-10). (2) Further proof from the O.T. (vv. 11-18). (3) The moral appeal to the readers of the Epistle (vv. 19-25). (4) Words of warning (vv. 26-31). (5) Words of encouragement and hope (vv. 32-39).

1-10. The Failure of the Jewish Sacrifices and the Finality of the Sacrifice of Christ. In this paragraph the writer emphasizes again the futility of the sacrifices of the Levitical order and shows how they have been superseded by the perfect sacrifice of Christ. He uses five arguments (some of which are a repetition of the previous discussion) culminating in an appeal to the great statement in Psa. 40. (1) He begins by reiterating the argument based upon the Platonic philosophy which he has already used in 8^{1, 2} (see notes). The Law is only the shadow and not the reality of the revelation which was to come in Jesus Christ. The O.T. was the shadow cast by the Christian faith before its advent. In Christianity the heavenly reality—the very truth of God—broke into human history (v. 1). (2) The facts themselves prove the inefficiency of the Jewish sacrifices (vv. 1, 2). There was no finality about them. They had to be constantly repeated. They never took away the sense of sin from the hearts of the worshippers. If they had been effectual, there would have been no need for their constant repetition. (3) All that the sacrifices could produce was an annual remembrance of sins (v. 3). Instead of removing sin, the Law only intensified the sense of sin. This is exactly the position taken by Paul. "Through the law cometh knowledge of sin" (Rom. 320). "The law came in beside, that the trespass might abound" (Rom. 520; cf. Rom. 415 78 Gal. 319). (4) The very nature of the sacrifices proves that they are invalid (v. 4). It is impossible that the blood of animal victims should be able to cleanse a guilty conscience. The sacrifices are external. There is no bond of communion between the offerer and the sacrifice, and consequently there is no moral element in it. (5) The new and most powerful argument in the passage is based upon the quotation from Psa. 40⁶⁻⁸. The writer follows the LXX version as usual, and it is the translation in this version which really gives him his argument. The first two lines in the original Hebrew differ substantially from the rendering in the Greek version. "Sacrifice and offering thou hast no delight in; mine ears hast thou opened." For the latter phrase the LXX reads, "But a body didst thou prepare for me"; and it is this line which constitutes the basis of the argument. The writer holds that the words of the psalmist represent the utterance of the Messiah when he comes into the world. The Messiah is depicted as asking the question, "What is the function for which I have been sent to the earth? What is the rationale of my mission?" And the answer comes: "God took no pleasure in the old sacrifices and offerings. His remedy for human need lay in a divine incarnation ('a body hast thou prepared for me'). Burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin were not the object of God's desire. What God needed was entire obedience and consecration of spirit." And so the Messiah adds, "I am come in fulfillment of prophecy, for the whole of the Old Testament speaks of my Advent. 'In the roll of the book it is written of me'—I am come to consecrate a life of complete obedience to thee, O God." The whole passage, as interpreted by this writer, contains a striking contrast between the Jewish Law and the divine ideal of religion as it has been realized in Christianity. The former consisted of external sacrifices, the latter of an incarnate life of complete obedience to the will of God. Granted the accuracy of the LXX rendering of the passage (and this was admitted by all Greek-speaking Christians at the time), the argument is very powerful, especially for the first-century mind. The quotation contains a condemnation by the O.T. itself of the sacrificial system and a prophecy of the incarnation and the life of supreme obedience which are destined to supersede the Law in the new era of the Christian faith. The O.T. by the mouth of the psalmist abolishes the system of sacrifices and establishes the new type of religion introduced by Christ. The paragraph ends with the triumphant assertion that because Christ has fulfilled the will of God and offered a sacrifice which met the divine requirements as the Jewish sacrifice could not do, we have been sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all (v. 10).

11-18. Further Proof from the Statements of the Old Testament. The writer introduces further arguments to prove the finality of the offering of Christ. The ordinary priests stand day by day in the Temple offering their sacrifices. "Their mighty labor," as Peake says, "like that of Sisyphus, ends always in nothing. The pathetic inefficiency of all the elaborate apparatus, this daily addition of naught to naught which at the end of the long centuries have mounted up to zero, is all the more striking in the light of Christ's sacrifice offered once only but effective forever." The finality of his sacrifice is proved by the fact that after it had been offered he triumphantly sat down on the right hand of God, thus showing that the whole purpose had been achieved and nothing more now remained to be done. The point is demonstrated by a fresh appeal to one of the writer's favorite psalms, which has already been cited in 113 56 717, 21. The psalm (110¹) represents God as saying to the Messiah, "Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool." The work is complete; all that remains is to wait for the final victory. The writer then clinches his argument by a reference to Jeremiah's prophecy of the new covenant previously cited in 88-12. On this occasion, however, the important fact lies not in the general prediction of the establishment of a new covenant but in the last phrase, Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more. These words imply that the power of sin has been finally destroyed and that there is no further need of another offering. Therefore the sacrifice of Christ is final and complete and there is no need for any further offering for sin.

19-25. The Moral and Spiritual Appeal. Our faith should give us confidence for two reasons: (1) We are no longer like the Jewish people who had the right in the person of their high priest to enter the holy of holies only once a year. Christ has opened for us by his sacrifice a new and living way into the immediate presence of God (v. 20). He has passed through the veil which no longer now hides God from our eyes. The veil was his flesh. It is not easy to see exactly what the writer means by the last phrase. Some scholars have taken it to mean "through the incarnate life," and have argued that it was the fact that Christ took upon himself our human nature that broke down the barrier between God and man. The difficulty about this interpretation is that it is out of harmony with the whole purpose of the writer's argument, namely, to show that it is the offered life that opens the new way for men. It is better, therefore, to assume that the phrase refers not to the incarnate life of Christ but to his death. At death Christ passed through the veil of flesh into the immediate presence of God. (2) In Christ we have a great High Priest (v. 21) who has now been set in authority over the house of God, and to him we can come without dismay. But there are certain conditions which must be fulfilled before the approach is possible. We must come (a) with sincere hearts, (b) with the full assurance of faith, (c) with our conscience purged and cleansed, (d) with our bodies washed in pure water (v. 22). The allusion in the last clause is probably to Christian baptism. And faith should lead on to hope (v. 23), and, relying on the sure promise of God, we should cling with tenacity to the Christian hope which is part of our creed. Moreover, faith and hope should result in charity (v. 24). We should challenge one another to a life of love and service. We must not leave the Christian fellowship, for it is in fellowship that we gain the greatest stimulus to Christian service. It is obvious from the phrase, as the custom of some is, that there was a tendency in some quarters for Christians to drift away from the common life of the church. It may be that under stress of threatened persecution some of them thought they would avoid danger by ceasing to identify themselves with the Christian community; or possibly the writer is referring to people who left a small and struggling cause in the lurch (for that is what the word forsaking really means) in order to join a more flourishing church; or it may be that the reference is to men who, like many of the devotees of the Greek cults, thought when once they had been initiated that there was no further need for fellowship. But whatever may have been the type of people the writer has in mind, his words are a strong protest against individualism in religion. The church is as necessary for the individual as the individual is for the church.

26-31. The Penalty of Apostasy. Once more, as in 64-8 (see notes), the writer pronounces the terrible doom which will fall on those who lapse from the faith. To the writer willful apostasy is a fatal and unforgivable sin. He justifies his position (1) by an appeal to the Law of Moses, which in Deut. 172-7 definitely laid it down that in the case of willful transgression of the commandments of the Law, "thou shalt bring forth that man or that woman, which have done this evil thing . . . and thou shalt stone them with stones, that they die." How much more terrible will be the fate of the apostate, since he has trampled the Son of God under his feet, profaned the covenant sacrifice, and done despite to the gracious Spirit of God! (2) By an appeal to two O.T. texts which speak of God's punishment of sin. One of these is from Deut. 32³⁵, "Vengeance is mine, and recompence"—a text which is quoted by Paul in Rom. 12¹⁹ with a different application. The second quotation occurs in two O.T. books, Deut. 32³⁶ and Psa. 135¹⁴, "The Lord shall judge his people." The severity of the writer of Hebrews is due to the fact that apostasy was one of the greatest perils of the church in his time. This passage should be read in the light of the discussion of the problem in the notes on ch. 6.

32-39. Words of Encouragement and Hope. As in ch. 6, the writer follows his description of the fate of the apostates with a message of assurance and confidence (see 6⁹). The splendid history of the church in the past will be the guarantee of its final victory. It has already passed triumphantly through a severe testing time. It has endured a great conflict. It has been held up, as a public spectacle, to reproach. It has stood firm through the crisis. When some of its members were thrown into prison, it did not abandon them to their fate but had compassion on them. It took joyfully the confiscation of property. The translation of the next clause, which gives the reason for the readiness to endure the spoiling of goods, is uncertain. The rendering of the R.V., knowing that ye yourselves have a better possession (v. 34), seems to be weak and inadequate. The marginal translation is preferable, ye have your own selves for a better possession. The soul is the highest human possession and is far more valuable than property. The persecuted Christians rejoiced in confiscation because they felt that spoliation of property made for the welfare of the soul.

Such heroic endurance in the past ought to nerve the church to meet the trials of the present. You must not through cowardice now lose the reward of your earlier sacrifices. It will not be a long struggle. For, as the prophet Habakkuk said of the appointed time, "Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not delay" (23). The interpretation which the writer puts on the words of the prophet is of course, "The coming of the Lord is at hand, and we must wait with courage till he comes."

The following words of the prophetic oracle are still more appropriate to the situation: My righteous one shall live by faith. This is the text upon which Paul lays such stress in Rom. 1¹⁷ and which he makes the basis of his doctrine of justification by faith. In Habakkuk faith meant loyalty or steadfastness—and this meaning of the word is more appropriate in Hebrews. Then follows a note of warning: If he shrink back, my soul hath no pleasure in him. The whole quotation is taken from the LXX, which differs considerably from the Hebrew. The writer reverses the order of the last two clauses. The paragraph concludes with the reassuring statement: "We are not like the men of whom the prophet speaks. We do not shrink back from the faith into destruction. We are men of faith and our faith will save our souls."

CHAPTER XI

The main argument of the Epistle is now concluded. The writer has proved his theme that Christ is the ideal High Priest who offered the ideal sacrifice in the ideal sanctuary. He now proceeds to the more practical part of the Epistle, and in ch. 11 he takes up the word faith with which he concluded his appeal in ch. 10 and proceeds to define and illustrate its working in the history of the past.

1, 2. The Definition of Faith. Faith is defined as the confidence that our hopes will be realized and the conviction of the reality of the unseen world. This definition differs from the conception of faith which we find in the epistles of Paul. To Paul faith is the surrender of the soul to Christ. To the writer of Hebrews it means (1) the full assurance that the Christian hope and the promises of God will be fulfilled, and (2) the belief that the unseen world is the supreme reality. Cf. the statement in v. 27, "He endured as seeing him who is invisible." The writer in the remainder of the chapter illustrates his interpretation of the meaning of the faith by appealing to history.

3. Faith and the Creation. We believe that the world was created by the fiat of God. We reject all other theories of its origin. The visible universe was not, as the Epicureans maintain, made out of the fortuitous concourse of atoms. No materialistic explanation of the origin of the world is adequate. Nature cannot explain itself. This is the meaning of the difficult phrase, so that what is seen hath not been made out of things which do appear. God, and not mere matter, is the source of everything.

4. The Faith of Abel. It was faith that enabled Abel to offer a better sacrifice than Cain. The writer does not explain in what the superiority of Abel's offering consisted. He probably, however, means to imply that faith created in the mind of Abel an instinct that God required not merely cereal offerings but a blood-sacrifice (Gen. 44). Otherwise we must assume that the value of Abel's offering lay in the fact that it was more costly than that of Cain and so involved greater self-denial.

5, 6. The Faith of Enoch. The writer accepts the common tradition based on Gen. 5²⁴ that Enoch was translated into heaven without passing through death, and says that this miracle was the reward for his faith and piety. There was another tradition, however, which is preserved by Philo, that the translation was simply the conversion of Enoch from a life of vice to a life of virtue. The reference to Enoch ends with a further analysis of the conception of faith. Faith involves two convictions: one, that God exists, the other, that he recompenses all who are in quest of him.

7. The Faith of Noah. The essential point of Noah's faith is described in the phrase, warned of God concerning things not seen as yet. This is the first real illustration of that part of the definition in v. 1 which describes faith as the realization of things not seen.

8-19. The Faith of Abraham. Abraham is the supreme example of faith. His faith is illustrated (1) by his journey to the promised land (vv. 8-10); (2) by his confidence that God would give him sons in accordance with his promise (vv. 11, 12); (3) by his sacrifice of Isaac (17-19). The first illustration, as the writer develops it, is a magnificent example of faith. The call of God comes to Abraham in Ur of the Chaldees to leave home and kindred and go forth as a pioneer in quest of the promised land and the city of God—the city which has the true foundations, whose architect and builder is God.

The writer elaborates the story of Genesis, which contains no account of the vision of the ideal city. According to a later tradition, however, which has been preserved in the Apocalypse of Baruch, Abraham was shown a vision of the celestial city during the incident described in Gen. 15.

The second illustration is concerned with the faith which resulted in the miraculous birth of Isaac (cf. Gen. 15²⁻²¹). It is significant, and in keeping with the general tone of Hebrews, that stress is laid on the faith of Sarah and not merely on that of Abraham. In the reference to the same subject in the epistles of Paul (Rom. 4¹⁹) though the faith of Abraham is strongly accentuated, there is no reference to the faith of Sarah.

The next paragraph (vv. 13-16) is an interlude in the argument. It contains a general reflection by the writer on the faith of the patriarchs. The vision that came to them was a vision far too great to be realized in their day. In obedience to faith they went out on their quest but they never realized the divine promises, though they saw them dimly hovering in the distance and hailed them from afar. They acknowledged that they were only strangers and wanderers seeking the promised city. They might have given up the search and returned to their old country. But to do that would have been to abandon their ideal. It is plain, therefore, that their quest was for a city which would not be found on earth but could only be realized in heaven. God recognized their faith and bestowed on them a celestial city.

The final illustration of the faith of Abraham (vv. 17-19) is found in the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen. 22¹⁻¹⁸). Though Isaac was Abraham's only son (Ishmael is excluded because he was not included in the divine promises), and though the future depended upon him, yet when he was put to the test (R.V. being tried) Abraham did not shrink from obeying what he took to be the call of God to offer him as the supreme sacrifice. He was confident that as God had given Isaac in the first instance by a miracle, he would, rather than break his promises, restore him to life again by another miracle. The last phrase of v. 19 may be paraphrased thus: "Abraham, figuratively speaking, received Isaac back from death, though he did not actually die." There may also be a hidden reference to the resurrection of Christ in the words, which may be translated, "Abraham received him back by what was a parable of the resurrection of Christ," though the explanation seems to read into the text more than it actually contains.

20-22. The Faith of the Patriarchs. The writer passes very lightly over the faith of the other patriarchs. He cites two illustrations of blessings pronounced by Isaac and Jacob respectively on their descendants assuring them that the promises of God to Abraham would be fulfilled for them and their children. The last phrase in v. 21, He worshipped, leaning upon the top of his staff, differs from the Hebrew narrative in Gen. 47³¹ which reads, "And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head," and follows the LXX, which substitutes the word "staff" for "bed's head." The faith of Joseph consisted in the conviction that the Israelites would be delivered from the thralldom of Egypt and that his body would be laid to rest in the Holy Land (Gen. 50²⁴⁻²⁶).

23-29. The Faith of Moses. The writer finds many more illustrations of faith in the career of Moses. (1) There is the faith of his parents who saved his life in infancy (v. 23). (2) There is his act of self-renunciation by which he declined the royal position and prerogatives and identified himself with his own outcast race (vv. 24, 25). The motive which actuated him is given in v. 26, accounting the reproach of Christ (or the Messiah) greater riches than the treasures of Egypt—a phrase which seems to assume that it was faith in the Messiah which was the guiding principle of Moses. The writer by using these words makes Moses an example to the men of his own generation, who in the persecutions were called upon to suffer the reproach of Christ. (3) The third illustration of the faith of Moses consists in his flight to Midian (Ex. 21^{4f.}). The point of this illustration is more difficult to explain, especially as the phrase, not fearing the wrath of the king, seems to contradict the statements of Exodus, where it is stated: "When Pharaoh heard this thing he sought to slay Moses. But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh." In view of the difficulty of finding a real example of faith in the retreat to Midian and also in view of the apparent discrepancy between the statements of Hebrews and Exodus, many scholars have attempted to find in the phrase, he forsook Egypt, an allusion to the Exodus itself. There is, however, an overwhelming objection to this view because the order of the verses compels us to find in v. 27 an event prior to the keeping of the Passover in v. 28, and the retreat to Midian is the only incident which meets the requirement. The real explanation seems to be this: Moses at the moment was smarting under a sense of failure. His own people had turned against him. He had incurred the enmity of the king. He was forced to abandon the enterprise upon which he had set his heart. It looked as if the opportunity of emancipating his people had gone. And yet he did not lose heart. In spite of disappointment and disillusionment he kept his faith. He knew that Pharaoh could not finally thwart the divine purpose and so he endured as seeing him who is invisible (v. 27). As Peake says: "He rose above the realm of sight and his steadfast courage grew strong in contemplation of the unseen. For the courage to abandon work on which the whole heart is set and accept inaction cheerfully as the will of God is of the rarest and highest kind, and can be created and sustained only by the clearest spiritual vision." (4) The next act of faith (v. 28) is seen in Moses' obedience to commands of God (Ex. 12¹²⁻⁴⁸) in connection with the instructions to keep the Passover and sprinkle blood on the lintels and doorposts that the destroyer of the firstborn might not touch them. (5) The fifth and last illustration of the faith of Moses (v. 29) consists in the passage of the Red Sea.

30, 31. Two further illustrations of faith are given in these verses: (1) The collapse of the walls of Jericho (Josh. 6¹⁻²⁰). Here it is the faith of a whole people that secures the victory. (2) The faith of Rahab—the faith of an individual.

32-38. A Summary Statement of Later Illustrations of Faith. The writer now abandons the attempt to compile a further list of particular illustrations of faith and contents himself with a general statement. He alludes first of all to the exploits of the four great judges—Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephthah—and then to the achievements of David, Samuel, and the prophets; and then in a series of telling phrases, he gives a list of their mighty acts of faith. Some of these phrases, e.g., wrought righteousness, obtained promises, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war, turned to flight armies of aliens are quite general, and apply to many of the heroes of whom the writer is thinking. Others, however, are far more specific, and contain a reference to some definite event in the history of Israel. Stopped the mouths of lions refers to Daniel (ch. 6); quenched the power of fire, to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego (Dan. 3); women received their dead by a resurrection, to the widow of Zarephath (1 Kings 18⁸⁻²⁴) and the Shunammite (2 Kings 4¹⁸⁻³⁷); others were tortured (literally, "beaten to death," or "broken on the wheel"), to the martyrdom of Eleazar and the seven brothers recorded in 2 Macc. 6 and 7; they were stoned, to Zechariah (2 Chron. 24²⁰⁻²²) and to the tradition that this fate befell Jeremiah in Egypt; were sawn asunder, to the tradition mentioned in the Ascension of Isaiah (51⁻¹⁴) that Isaiah was sawn in two with a wooden saw during the reign of Manasseh; vv. 36-38 contain a general reference to the sufferings of the faithful Jews during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes (see intro. to Daniel) when they were harried and hunted into the mountains and forced to take refuge in holes and caves.

39, 40. The Epilogue. All these heroes of the past won a reputation for faith and realized some of the divine promises. But the final promise—the realization of the Messianic kingdom—was not granted to them. The writer frankly admits that their faith did not obtain the supreme reward, and in that respect, at any rate, it failed. But the failure was not due to any defect in them; it was simply a necessary condition in the working out of the divine purpose. The reward was only deferred till it was possible for Christ to come. We have entered into the great inheritance of faith, and through us, and the revelation that has been vouchsafed to us, the faith of the heroes of the past has been perfected. The realization of the hopes of the faithful in Israel's history depends upon our loyalty and steadfastness, since they without us cannot be made perfect.

CHAPTER XII

Ch. 12 opens with an urgent appeal based upon the record of the achievements of faith in ch. 11 (vv. 1, 2) and then proceeds to discuss the meaning and significance of suffering (vv. 3-11). This is followed by an appeal to the church to strive to attain the Christian ideal (vv. 12-17); and, finally, Christians are warned of the great responsibility which the establishment of the new covenant throws upon them and the terrible doom which will fall upon those who are disloyal and unfaithful (vv. 18-29).

1, 2. The Urgent Appeal to Run the Christian Race. The writer in this paragraph depicts the Christian life as a race in the amphitheater. The metaphor is borrowed from the Greek games. There is the arena surrounded by tiers of seats which are thronged by spectators who watch the various contests and cheer on their chosen champions. The conditions of success are described. The runners throw off all their superfluous garments, that they may be free to exert their maximum strength and gain their maximum speed. Their footsteps never flag and their efforts are never relaxed. Their eyes are fixed steadily upon the goal and they strain every nerve to win the prize. The use of this metaphor seems to have been very popular and there are frequent references to it in the N.T. Cf. 1 Cor. 9:24-27, where Paul draws lessons both from the footrace and the boxing match.

Every phrase in vv. 1, 2, is based on the metaphor, and every phrase is used with telling effect. As the amphitheater is surrounded by tiers of seats from which the spectators watch the game, so the arena of life is surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses. The allusion, of course, is to the list of heroes enumerated in the previous chapter who are represented as being intensely interested in the struggle of the early church, since they without us cannot be made perfect. To succeed in the Christian race we must lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us. The meaning of the last phrase has been much disputed, as the Greek word is never found elsewhere and its significance is uncertain. The best suggestion is that it means "close fitting," or "clinging closely round," and refers to the hampering effect of sin, which, like a clinging robe, impedes the steps of the runner of the heavenly race. Let us run with patience. Patience here means "steadfastness," or "loyalty," and the phrase should be translated, therefore, "Let us run with unflinching purpose." Looking unto Jesus. As the eyes of the runner in the race are fixed upon its goal, so the eyes of the Christian must be fixed upon Christ. The author and perfecter of our faith. The word translated author is found also in 2:10, where Christ is described as the author of salvation. The phrase used here is very significant. Christ is not only the author or founder of the Christian faith. He is the completer or finisher as well. He can never, therefore, be superseded. He has spoken not only the first word but the last word too. Christianity, therefore, is final in a sense in which the O.T. revelation could never be. Hence the Christian life must be an Imitatio Christi. But what is it in Christ that ought to dominate the vision of the Christian? The answer to this question is given in the following phrase, who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame. We should interpret the word joy by giving it the sense which Bergson ascribes to it. "Nature," says Bergson, "has set up a sign which apprises us every time our activity is in full expansion. That sign is joy. True joy is always an emphatic signal of the triumph of life. Wherever joy is, creation has been, and the richer the creation the greater the joy. True joy is always the symbol of creative work." It was because the work of redemption was the greatest creative act ever wrought that the joy of Jesus was supreme, and it was this sense of joy that enabled him to despise the shame and endure the cross.

3-11. The Meaning of Suffering. The reference to the suffering of Christ in v. 2 leads the writer on to discuss the meaning of the sufferings of the Christians of his day. He has already in 2:10 and 5:8, 9 dealt with some aspects of the problem and shown how Christ himself was made perfect through suffering and learned obedience by the things which he suffered. He now proceeds to apply this principle to the sufferings which befell the Christians of his time under stress of persecution. "Take Christ as your example," he urges. "Think of all the sufferings which he endured at the hands of his enemies, and it will keep your hearts from fainting and failing (v. 3). His sufferings were far greater than yours, for you have not yet had to shed your blood, as he did, in resistance to evil (v. 4). You must not forget the appeal which God makes to you in the words of the book of Proverbs, where suffering is described as the chastening or discipline of the Lord. The Lord disciplines the man he loves and scourges everyone upon whom he bestows the name of son (vv. 5, 6). It is therefore for the sake of discipline that you have to endure these sufferings. God is treating you as sons, and discipline is a necessary element in such a relationship. If you were not sons, there would have been no ground for this remedial discipline; but the very conception of the Fatherhood of God implies the necessity of discipline (vv. 7, 8). If discipline were absent, it would mean that God did not regard you as sons. We recognize the right of earthly parents to punish their children for their good; ought we not to submit to the Father of our spirits when he disciplines us for our advantage that we may attain eternal life? (V. 9.) Our fathers exercised discipline over us during our youth for their own ends and according to their own standards and ideas (which may sometimes have been erroneous), but God never makes mistakes; his discipline is perfect and the end which he has in view is to make us partakers of his own holiness (v. 10). Discipline always seems at the time to be irksome and painful, but when it is divine discipline it produces in its final issue a life of peace and righteousness."

12-17. An Exhortation to Pursue the Christian Ideal. "Since suffering is a discipline, we must not allow ourselves to be dismayed by it. We must not let our hands hang listlessly down or our knees grow weak. We must encourage the flagging energies of fainting souls and try to smooth the path of life for them, that the road may be made easier for them, so that those who are lame may not have their feet dislocated by the rough places in the way (vv. 12, 13). We must always set before ourselves the two supreme elements in the Christian ideal—peace and consecration (v. 14)—and we must watch carefully lest any of us may miss the grace of God. And we must strive after these virtues not only for our own personal lives but for the life of the Christian community as well. We must always be on our guard lest the poisonous root of bitterness spring up and contaminate the church. We must see to it that no member of the church is guilty of immorality or lives a profane life like Esau. Esau should be a warning to us. For a single plate of food he sold his birthright (v. 16). He lost his blessing forever though he afterward made the most strenuous efforts to regain it. He found no place of repentance" (v. 17).

Three interpretations of the last phrase are possible. The words, though he sought it diligently with tears, may be connected with the first clause of the verse. In this case it is the blessing which he seeks to regain in vain. Or they may be connected with the clause which the R.V. puts in brackets. He found no place of repentance, though he sought it diligently with tears. In this case we must suppose that Esau had committed the unpardonable sin for which no forgiveness was possible, and he becomes an illustration of the terrible words of 64-6 and 1026. 27. Another alternative is suggested in the rendering in the A.S.V., which makes a change of mind in Isaac the thing that Esau sought in vain (see R.V. mg.).

18-29. The Old Covenant and the New. The warning words of the previous paragraph are now driven home by a contrast between the responsibilities involved in the two covenants, the old and the new. The character of the old covenant is first described in sensuous images. "You Christians," says the writer, "have not come, as Moses and your forefathers did, to an earthly mountain like Mount Sinai, that blazed with fire and had its head shrouded in mist and darkness, while a terrible storm raged all about it. Out of the tempest came the blare of a trumpet and a Voice so awful that men prayed that it might never be repeated. Such sanctity was attached to the mountain that no one was allowed to approach it. If even a beast committed unconscious trespass upon it, it was immediately stoned to death. So full of dread was the scene that even Moses, to whom the law of God was to be revealed, trembled with fear and said, 'I am terrified and afraid.'" Such is the picture which the writer draws of the circumstances under which the old covenant was given to Israel. The unapproachable mountain stands as the symbol of an unapproachable God (vv. 18-21).

The writer now turns to the other picture. "You Christians have not come to a mount of terror like Sinai, but to Mount Zion and the eternal city of the living God—the New Jerusalem in heaven. It is no scene of dread that meets your eyes. The vision you see is the vision of a festal assembly of angels and a great concourse of the first-born sons of God whose names are inscribed in the register of heaven. Amid this great assembly stands God the Judge of all men, and with him are the spirits of just men who have been made perfect, and Christ himself the mediator of the new covenant, who has offered the perfect sacrifice, the sacrifice which is far superior to that which Abel offered in the patriarchal age" (vv. 22-24).

Such is the contrast which the writer draws between the two pictures—the picture of the horrors of Mount Sinai and the picture of the bliss and joy of heaven. In the latter vision there are some difficulties of exegesis. In the R.V. the phrase, to the general assembly and church of the first-born, suggests that the writer links with the innumerable hosts of angels a vast company of the redeemed gathered together in a heavenly church. There are difficulties, however, about the interpretation. (1) There is no connecting article before the second phrase, and it looks, therefore, as if the second clause stood in apposition to the first. For this reason it seems probable that the general assembly and church of the first-born further describes and defines the innumerable hosts of angels. The word translated church need not be taken in its technical sense and may simply mean "gathering." (2) The human elements in the heavenly throng are subsequently described as the spirits of just men made perfect, and it seems improbable that the redeemed saints would be mentioned twice in the picture. For these reasons it seems better to translate the clauses thus: "to innumerable hosts of angels in festive gathering, the assembly of the first-born whose names are registered as citizens of heaven."

The next paragraph contains an appeal based on the two visions which have just been described (vv. 25-29): "See that ye refuse not to listen to the divine voice. Remember the fate of those who spurned the commands which God uttered at Sinai. How much greater will be the penalty that will fall on those of us who despise the voice that comes to us from heaven! At Sinai God's voice shook the earth (Ex. 19¹⁸), and the prophet Haggai (26. 21) has told us that another earthquake will shake the world at the end of time: 'Once more I will make the earth and the heavens tremble.' That prophecy has yet to be fulfilled—as the phrase once more clearly denotes, and this shaking will be final. In this final shock all material things will perish; only the spiritual realities will remain unshaken. We belong to a kingdom which cannot be affected by the convulsion which will destroy the material universe. Let us be thankful that when the kingdoms of this world perish in the last catastrophe, the realm to which we belong will come scathless out of the fires. Let us serve God faithfully, and let us do it with fear and awe, for our God is a consuming fire and in this fire all that is unworthy and impure will be destroyed."

In this last phrase the writer emphasizes the moral severity and sternness of God who never fails to inflict punishment on the sinner. Some scholars see in the phrase consuming fire an allusion to the cleansing and purifying influence of fire, and they suggest the inference that the final end of punishment is always remedial—but there is nothing in the phrase itself or in the context to warrant the interpretation, which seems quite foreign to the general teaching of the Epistle.

CHAPTER XIII

Ch. 13 is a postscript to the Epistle. It may be divided as follows: (1) Sundry counsels to the members of the Christian Church (vv. 1-6). (2) An exhortation on the respect which is due to the leaders of the church (vv. 7-9a). (3) A paragraph of warning in view of the perils of the times (vv. 9b-16). (4) Personal messages and a great doxology (vv. 17-25).

1-6. Counsels to the Members of the Church. The writer gives the following injunctions bearing upon the life of the church. (1) Let love of the brethren continue. The phrase "brotherly love" always denotes in the N.T. "love of your fellow church member." One of the earliest names given to Christians to describe their relations to each other was the term "brethren." In fact, the word "brother," except in the few cases where it is used of natural relationship, always means "fellow church member." (Cf. 1 Jn. 4²⁰: "He that loveth not his brother [i.e., fellow church member] whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen.") (2) Cultivate hospitality. Hospitality is regarded in the N.T. as one of the Christian virtues. (Cf. Rom. 12¹³ 1 Tim. 3² 1 Pet. 4⁹.) Hospitality often brings unexpected blessing: Some have entertained angels unawares. The allusion is to Gen. 18²-19³. (3) Remember those who are in prison for conscience sake; and those who are suffering persecution (v. 3). (4) An exhortation to chastity (v. 4). The marriage bond must be kept intact. Immorality and adultery will be severely punished by God. (5) The Christian must be free from avarice (v. 5)—another injunction which is often emphasized in the N.T. Cf. Col. 3⁵, where avarice is described as idolatry. The Christian need not fear that by obeying this precept he is running the risk of poverty, for God has given us the most explicit promise that he will never desert us in our hour of need.

7-9a. The Right Attitude Toward the Leaders of the Church. The leaders of the church are entitled to honor and respect. We are not told what exact position it was that these leaders held in the church, or whether they corresponded to the bishops who are mentioned in Phil. 1¹, or to the elders who are found in many apostolic churches, or the deacons who are frequently alluded to in the N.T. (see discussion on pp. 1277-8). The use of the general term "leader" seems to suggest that no technical titles had as yet come into use in the church to which Hebrews is addressed, though, of course, it is possible that it may be employed to cover all the different types of men who held offices of any kind in the church.

The special function of the leaders referred to here was preaching. They spake unto you the word of God. Some of them seem to have suffered martyrdom, and their glorious death ought to be an example to the rest of the flock. The paragraph ends with the fine phrase, Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and to-day, yea, and forever. Leaders may come and go. They are with us for a time and then depart. But Jesus remains unchangeably the same. What he has been proven to be yesterday he is still to-day, and what he has been yesterday and is to-day he will continue to be forever.

9b-16. A Warning Against False Sacramental Ideas. The concluding phrase of the last section forms the introduction to that which follows. As Christ remains the same and his teaching is therefore the permanent test of truth, we must be careful not to become the victims of false teaching. Against whom is the warning directed? It does not seem, as some suggest, to be uttered against an ascetic Jewish sect which taught that the spiritual life can be maintained only by complete abstinence from certain kinds of food. The definite statement of the writer seems to point in another direction. Some maintain that the spiritual life is nourished not by abstinence but by eating certain kinds of food. It is against this theory that the writer protests when he asserts that it is good that the heart be established by grace; not by meats, wherein they that occupied themselves were not profited. It is probable that the reference is to the sacrificial meals which were common both among Jews and pagans and which were supposed to strengthen and intensify the religious life. There may even be a suggestion that the writer intends to make a protest against the sacramentarian theories which were creeping into the Christian Church and beginning to transform the Lord's Supper into a sacrificial meal. If this is so (and a strong case can be made out in defense of the theory), the Epistle to the Hebrews is the first challenge to the introduction of the sacramental doctrines which afterward corrupted the church. Whether the sacramentarianism which the writer has in mind is Jewish, pagan, or Christian cannot be determined with absolute certainty, but we may be sure that in some form it constituted the strange teachings against which the Epistle fulminates in this very difficult paragraph.

The argument which is used to demolish sacramentarianism is very intricate, and scholars are by no means agreed about all the details of its interpretation. The writer draws a contrast between two types of sacrifice. (1) There were some sacrifices, i.e., those which were offered for minor offenses, when the flesh was eaten by the priests and Levites (Lev. 625-29). (2) But in the case of the important sin-offerings—and especially the sacrifice on the Day of Atonement—the flesh was never eaten but was burned in the fire (Lev. 630).

The point of the argument seems to be this: We Christians have an altar and a sacrifice, but it is not a sacrifice which can be eaten. It belongs to the type of the most sacred sin-offerings, the blood of which was brought by the high priest into the holy place, and the bodies could not be eaten even by the members of the priestly caste but were consumed by fire outside the camp. The supreme element in the sacrifice which Christ offered is the blood which as supreme High Priest he offered in the ideal sanctuary in heaven. His body was afterward destroyed, and it is entirely a mistake to suppose that there is any possibility for the Christian to partake of that body in the communion service. In that service, Christ is received "after a spiritual manner."

The paragraph ends with an appeal (vv. 13-16). Jesus suffered without the gate. He was expelled from the city. We too must welcome persecution and exile, that we may follow him. We must not set store upon our earthly status and our social ties; we must be prepared to abandon everything and share the reproach of Christ. There is nothing permanent in the state of the earthly city in which we live. Our quest is for the eternal city—the city not made with hands, whose architect and maker is God (cf. 911 1110). And though we have no sacrifices such as are offered by Jews and pagans in their temples, there is a spiritual sacrifice which we can make to God, and that sacrifice is the sacrifice of praise that proceeds from lips that make public confession of Christ. Moreover, there is a further form of sacrifice which is well-pleasing to God—the sacrifice of charity and beneficence.

17-19. Another Reference to the Leaders of the Church and a Request for Prayer. In a previous paragraph (vv. 7-9) the writer has referred to the leaders of the church in the past. He now claims obedience for the actual leaders who presided over the church at the time when he was writing. "Give obedience," he says, "to your leaders and yield to their counsels, for they have your spiritual welfare at heart and are like watchmen standing guard over your souls. They bear a heavy weight of responsibility and will have to give an account of their stewardship to God. Do not make their task heavier than it already is. Let their work be a joy to them rather than a burden. The greater the burden you throw upon them, the greater will be your own loss."

In vv. 18, 19 occurs the first personal note in the Epistle. Hitherto the writer has kept his personality in the background. Now he pleads for the readers' prayers. The people to whom he is writing may not always have agreed with him, but his own conscience is quite clear. He has done his best for them and has always striven to live for the highest ends. One result of their prayers may be that he will be able to return to them more speedily.

20, 21. A Great Doxology. Having asked his readers for their prayers the writer now prays for them, and the prayer takes the form of a magnificent doxology. The prayer is a canto of phrases culled from the O.T. and every phrase is used with telling effect. God is called the God of peace—the God who amidst the distractions of life and the storms of persecution brings peace to the soul. Jesus is described as the great shepherd, a phrase which seems reminiscent of the allegory in which Jesus describes himself as the Good Shepherd in Jn. 10¹¹⁻¹⁷.

The first and only direct reference to the resurrection of Jesus in the Epistle occurs in the phrase, who brought again from the dead. The words, with the blood of the eternal covenant, indicate the purpose and end of the resurrection. Jesus was raised from the dead that he might offer his blood—which effected a new covenant—in the heavenly sanctuary. It is a noteworthy element in the teaching of Hebrews that the actual work of atonement follows and does not precede the resurrection. Then comes the actual prayer itself—that God may make these Christians perfect in every good work, that they may be enabled to do his will and what is well-pleasing in his sight. Whether the concluding phrase, to whom be the glory for ever and ever, refers to God or to Christ is uncertain. The doxologies of the N.T. are generally ascribed to God, and the construction of the sentence seems to suggest that the ascription is here also made to him. But the fact that the final doxology is immediately preceded by the phrase, through Jesus Christ, has led many scholars to think that in this particular case the words are intended to apply to him.

22-25. Final Messages. In the final paragraph the writer appeals to his readers to bear with the appeal which he had made to them. He describes the Epistle as a word of exhortation, showing that he regards the practical appeal rather than the intellectual argument as the essential part of the letter. The stress which he lays upon the last request seems to suggest that he was conscious that his advice might be resented and criticized by some member or members of the church.

The reference to Timothy in v. 23 suggests that Timothy and the writer of the Epistle were colleagues in the work of the Christian ministry. What is meant by the phrase, hath been set at liberty, cannot be precisely determined. On the face of it, it seems to indicate that Timothy had been imprisoned and had now regained his freedom. But the words might also mean "set free from other tasks."

The salutation proves that the letter is addressed to the community of Christians, who are asked to convey a message from the writer to their leaders.

It is difficult to determine exactly the meaning of the phrase, They of Italy salute you. They of Italy may simply signify Italians; and if that is the case, the writer is obviously in Italy when he is writing the letter. But the words may also mean "those who have come from Italy," and in that case would seem to indicate that the Epistle is addressed to some church in Italy.

JAMES

BY PRINCIPAL EDWARD H. SUGDEN

INTRODUCTION

The Title. This is the first of the seven Epistles known as the General or Catholic Epistles, because they are not addressed to particular churches, like those of Paul. The Second and Third Epistles of John, though addressed to individuals, are included, since they are naturally connected with his First Epistle. In the oldest MSS. the Catholic Epistles follow Acts; but Jerome, in the Vulgate, put them after Hebrews; the English versions have followed his order.

Canonicity of the Epistle. It was formally admitted into the canon by the third Council of Carthage, 397 A.D. Eusebius (314 A.D.) includes it in his list, but classes it among the Antilegomena, i.e., books about which there was some dispute. He himself, however, accepts it and quotes it as Scripture. Origen (c. 200 A.D.) quotes it frequently as the work of James, and expresses no doubt as to its canonicity; and it was definitely recognized as canonical by Jerome and Augustine. On the other hand, it is not in the Muratorian Canon (toward the end of the second century), nor in the Old Latin version used by Tertullian (cir. 200 A.D.). The Peshitta Syriac version contains it, but the date of that version is not quite certain. The doubt felt about it was due (1) to its lack of apostolic authority; (2) to its Jewish cast of thought; (3) to the supposed opposition of its teaching on faith and works to that of Paul. It is now included in the canon by all the churches, though Luther spoke of it as "a right strawy Epistle," because he thought (quite wrongly) that it disagreed with Paul's doctrine of justification by faith.

The Author. In 1¹ the author describes himself as "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ." "James" is the English form of "Jacob," derived from it through the old French James, which again is an abbreviation of the Italian Giacomo from the late Latin Jacomus. It is unfortunate that our English translators have not retained Jacob as the name of the author, as the average reader does not connect James with Jacob, and so misses the fact that the author was named after the great forefather of Israel. From his name, as well as from the contents of the Epistle, it may be inferred: (1) that the author was a Jew, both by race and by religion, who had been converted to Christianity (1¹ 2¹ 58, 9); (2) that he was not an apostle, or he would surely have claimed that position in the heading of his Epistle, as Paul and Peter expressly, and John inferentially, do in their letters; (3) that he held a position of authority in the church; and (4) that he was so well known that his name alone was sufficient to enable his readers to identify him without any further description.

There are four Jacobs (or Jameses) mentioned in the N.T.: (1) James the son of Zebedee and brother of John, one of the apostles; (2) James the apostle, the son of Alphæus, who is almost certainly to be identified with James the Little, the son of Clopas (Mk. 15⁴⁰); (3) James the father of the apostle Judas (not Iscariot—Lk. 6¹⁶); (4) James the brother of our Lord (Mt. 13⁵⁵ Gal 1¹⁹), and of Jude (Jude 1¹). Can any of these be identified with the author of the Epistle? James the son of Zebedee is out of the question, as he was beheaded by Herod, 44 A.D. (Acts 12²). Of the second and third Jameses nothing is known beyond their name. But about the fourth we have a good deal of information. Along with Joseph, Simon, and Judas he was a brother of Jesus (Mt. 13⁵⁵ Mk. 6³). Whether he was the son of Joseph and Mary (the Helvidian view), or of Joseph by a former wife (the Epiphanian view) or a cousin of our Lord (the Hieronymian view), is a question not relevant to our present inquiry. (See art., "James," in Hastings' Dict. of the Bible.) His father, Joseph, was "a just man" (Mt. 1¹⁹), i.e., a strict observer of the Law; the names of his children are those of the forefather of his race, and of three of the patriarchs; and they were doubtless brought up in the atmosphere of rigorous Judaism. Along with Mary they regarded the early ministry of Jesus with suspicion and sought to restrain him (Mt. 12⁴⁷ Mk. 3²⁰⁻³³). They did not believe in him (Jn. 7⁵), and therefore cannot have been among his apostles. Hence on the cross Jesus committed the care of his mother, not to them, but to the apostle John (Jn. 19²⁶). After his resurrection our Lord appeared to James (1 Cor. 15⁷), and this resulted in his conversion; so that he and his brothers immediately associated themselves with the apostles (Acts 1¹⁴). His character and his relationship to our Lord secured for him the leadership of the church in Jerusalem. On his release from prison Peter at once sends word to him (Acts 12¹⁷); Paul visited him on his first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion (Gal. 1¹⁹) and later refers to him as one of the reputed "pillars" of the church (Gal. 2⁹). He was regarded by the Judaizing members of the church as their leader (Gal. 2¹²); but his real attitude is made clear by the action he took as chairman of the Synod of Jerusalem (Acts 15¹³⁻²¹). When Paul visited Jerusalem in 58 A.D., he consulted James and the elders, and they advised him to conciliate the Christians who were zealots for the Law by joining with four men who had taken the Nazirite vow, and paying their charges (Acts 21¹⁸⁻²⁶). From 1 Cor. 9⁵ it is inferred that he was married—which is antecedently probable. He is mentioned no more in the N.T. but Josephus (Antiquities, xx, 9: 1) relates that he was stoned to death about 62 A.D., by the high priest Ananus; and Hege-sippus (quoted by Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical History, ii, 23: 4-18) gives us many traditions about him; such as that he was a Nazirite from his birth; that he prayed so continuously that his knees became hard like a camel's; that he was called "The Just" and "Oblias," i.e., "the bulwark of the people"; that the Pharisees flung him from the roof of the Temple; and that he was killed by a blow from a fuller's club (see also Ante-Nicene Fathers, Eng. trans., vol. viii, pp. 762-3).

All this agrees so well with what we may infer about him from the Epistle that there can be little hesitation in claiming him as its author. Of course it is possible that the James of the Epistle may be some otherwise unknown Christian; or that it was originally anonymous and that the first verse was prefixed later as a likely guess. But such theories are quite needless, and the majority of scholars hold that the author was the brother of the Lord (but see note below). In harmony with this conclusion are these facts: (1) that the author's style is based on that of the Wisdom Literature of the O.T. and Apocrypha; and that he refers in many passages to the O.T. and to the Jewish apocryphal books, Ecclesiasticus and Wisdom; (2) that he knows and quotes from the Sermon on the Mount, for it was not the ethical teaching of Jesus that he disapproved but his Messianic claim; and one can easily understand how hard it was for him to believe that his own brother was the Messiah; (3) that in the circular addressed to the Gentile converts by the Synod of Jerusalem under the presidency of James (Acts 15²³) the form of the greeting is the same as that in the Epistle, and is not used elsewhere in the N.T. except in the letter of Claudius Lysias to Felix (Acts 23²⁶). Moreover, of the two hundred and thirty words used in the circular and in the address of James, eight occur also in the Epistle, and nowhere else in the N.T. in the same sense.

Date of the Epistle. Assuming that it was written by James, the brother of the Lord, it must have been written before his death, 62 or 63 A.D. This is confirmed by the absence of any reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, 70 A.D. The coincidences between this Epistle and Romans and 1 Peter are best explained by the assumption that Paul and Peter had read it and were referring to it. The date of Romans is 58 A.D. and of 1 Peter 64 A.D. (cf. intro. to each epistle). The silence of the author in regard to the decision of the Synod of Jerusalem, 51 A.D., indicates that it was written before that date. With this agrees the unorganized condition of the churches addressed; they still met in the synagogue; there is no mention of bishops or deacons; the only officers are the elders of the synagogue; and any member of the congregation could act as a teacher as the Spirit moved him. The theology of the Epistle is undeveloped; there is no mention of the incarnation or the atonement, and the author's attitude is much the same as that of Peter and Stephen as indicated in their addresses in the early chapters of Acts. The great majority of modern scholars therefore fix the date as somewhere between 40 and 50 A.D., and so make it the earliest book in the N.T.

There are, however, contrary opinions as to both authorship and date. J. H. Ropes (in James, International Critical Commentary) denies both the early date and the Jacobean authorship, and finds that the writer was "a Christian teacher in some half-hellenistic city of Palestine" somewhere between 70 and 125 A.D. B. W. Bacon supports him, in The Apostolic Message, especially pp. 177-180.

Destination of the Epistle. It is addressed to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion, or Diaspora. In the first century A.D. Jews were to be found in every city of importance throughout the civilized world. In almost all the cities visited by Paul on his missionary journeys he found Jewish synagogues, where Moses was read every Sabbath day. The Jews of the Dispersion were expected to pay their yearly Temple tax, and to visit Jerusalem at least once during their lives. An instructive list of those who were present on the Day of Pentecost is given in Acts 2^{9, 10}, and they undoubtedly carried back home with them the substance of Peter's teaching, and especially the good news that the Messiah had come in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. In this way it is probable that many Jewish-Christian communities were founded all over the empire. Later, in their annual visits to Jerusalem, they would become acquainted with James, and would recognize his official position as the head of the church there; and he would feel himself to be in a pastoral relation with them, which would suggest the sending to them such a communication as this Epistle. They were still Jews, proud of their descent from "Abraham our father" (2²¹), familiar with the O.T. (5⁴, 11, 17), and zealous for the Law (21² 41¹¹); but they had accepted Jesus as the Messiah (21) and were looking for his second coming (57). They attended the synagogue (22), and their relation to it was much the same as that of the early English Methodists to the Established Church. For fifty years the members of Wesley's societies were regarded by him as members of the Church of England; they attended service and took the sacraments at their parish churches; and their own meetings were not held in church hours. Their position was thus curiously parallel to that of these Jewish Christians, and their characteristics were much the same. The early Methodists were persecuted by the rich and influential members of the church, and were tempted to show undue subservience to them; they were mostly men "of low degree"; there were serious outbreaks of antinomianism among them, owing to the emphasis laid by Wesley on salvation by faith alone; ignorant but zealous brethren were ready to set themselves up as teachers; and Wesley had frequently to correct them for quarreling and strife among themselves. These are just the faults which James notes and against which he warns his readers. Peter, in his first Epistle, addresses the members of the Dispersion, but limits his scope to those in Asia Minor; and some have thought that James was specially thinking of the Eastern Dispersion in Mesopotamia; but of this there is no proof, and there is no ground for supposing that he was not addressing all the Jewish-Christians throughout the Roman world. It has been suggested that by "the twelve tribes" he means the whole Christian Church, as being the true Israel; but this is to credit him with the idea to which Paul later gave currency (Gal. 37. 29 Phil. 33) and to ignore the obviously Jewish tone of the Epistle. From Gal. 29 we learn that James regarded himself as being called to "go to the circumcision," and he would not be likely to travel beyond his commission. (Cf. pp. 847-9.)

Style and Contents of the Epistle. The style of the Epistle is influenced by the Wisdom

books of the O.T. and Apocrypha, with which the author was obviously well acquainted; but he did not set himself to imitate them; their influence was not present to his consciousness, though he naturally threw his thoughts into the form familiar to him. He had certain things to say and he said them without any attempt to express them in this or that literary style. In his case it is emphatically true that "the style is the man." We recognize his intense earnestness, his hatred of all shams, his practical temper, and his indignation at all forms of evil-doing; which finds expression in an ironical scorn hardly paralleled anywhere else in the N.T. The epistolary form is merely conventional; the letter is really a continuous exhortation, and in its one hundred and eight verses there are no fewer than fifty-four imperatives. He has no time to elaborate his terse, vivid apothegms; though he has a happy gift of striking illustration, which he uses most effectively. He makes no attempt to link his various subjects together on any logical system; he deals with each as it occurs to him, and often the only reason one can see for their order is some verbal suggestion which leads from one to another. Ropes (see "Literature") has pointed out the similarity existing between this Epistle and the popular Greek ethical addresses known as Diatribes; but the likeness is due to their common practical aim, and certainly not to any deliberate imitation of them by James; probably he had never heard of them. His Greek is, on the whole, pure and idiomatic; but not more so than would be quite possible to the inhabitant of a bilingual country, such as Palestine was in the first century (cf. p. 881). That the Epistle was written in Greek and not, as some have thought, in Aramaic, is shown by the frequent use of plays upon words, and alliteration; and by the author's familiarity with the LXX version of the O.T. and Apocrypha.

Teaching of the Epistle: Religion and Human Behavior. This Epistle is notable for its strong practical emphasis. It is characterized by an ethical passion which reminds us of the Hebrew prophets, the teaching of Jesus, and such great Pauline writings as Romans 12 and 1 Cor. 5-11. It is not especially concerned with questions of doctrine. One might almost say that the entire teaching of the Epistle is an elaboration of 12²: "Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deluding your own selves."

The ordinary supposition that James decries "justification by faith" is mistaken (see notes on 21^{4f.}). He simply undertakes to correct false inferences from that great doctrine, which we must therefore assume was being generally taught. As R. W. Dale points out, unless the doctrine were being taught in the church, James would hardly have engaged in this polemic against its misapplication. For Paul, the works that do not justify are legal and ceremonial acts, and it is not such works that James proposes to exhibit as proof of his faith (2¹⁸), but works such as those that Paul glorifies in Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 13 (cf. Jas. 12⁷). For James, it is not mere intellectual belief that justifies, but utter self-commitment to the service of the Lord Jesus Christ (1¹ 4¹⁵), and this is in substance what Paul means by the "faith" that "justifies" (Rom. 4, 5).

James makes one of the supreme tests of the religious life the attitude to others (2¹⁻¹²). For him, the Christian Community is essentially a democracy, more exactly a brotherhood, in which all superficial differences as between rich and poor drop away. Hence his injunction against "respect of persons," and especially against the unjust treatment of the poor by the rich (5⁴). He is concerned also that there shall be gentleness of speech within the brotherhood. He had evidently had experience of "the railing tongue," or had heard of churches disrupted by it (cf. 1 Cor. 6¹⁻⁷), and much that he has to say bears upon the necessity of being "swift to hear, slow to speak" (1¹⁹ 3²⁻¹² 4¹¹, 12 5⁹). The unkindly tongue is the expression of an unkindly temper, and an unkindly temper is alien to the name of Christ and to the perfect law (1²⁵, 26).

James also recognizes that consistent discipleship of Jesus will bring persecutions and testings (1²; see notes on 4⁴ 5⁷⁻¹¹). It necessarily involves enmity with the world (4⁴). He does not mean that Christians are to wrap themselves in a robe of righteous "superiority" (see 2¹), but that there are some things that, as Christians, it is not possible for them to do (cf. Mt. 6²⁴ 1 Cor. 10²¹). The refusal to do them cannot be made without cost, but the cost is itself intended as a disciplining and refining influence (1²⁻⁴ 5¹⁰, 11).

There are two passages denouncing religious inconsistency (4¹⁻¹⁰ 5¹⁻⁶) which might well have been lifted right out of the pages of Isaiah (12-17) or of Amos (5¹⁰⁻¹⁵, 21-24). They reveal James as the prophet of social righteousness, but also as one who recognizes that the way in which Christians shall behave in the wider relationships of life will depend upon their possession of moral inwardness. "Cleanse your hands . . . purify your hearts . . . humble yourselves" (4⁸, 10)—these are the indispensable conditions to the "good life" (3¹³), and to the just treatment of the poor by the rich (2⁶). Where there is not this inwardness, expressing itself in the just deed and the serviceable life, nothing can prevent a final collapse (5³). To know the good and not do it, this is sin indeed (4¹⁷).

In a word, James is concerned with exalting that true wisdom which consists in submission to the perfect law. His repeated use of the word "wisdom" (15 3¹³, 15, 17) indicates that he felt himself to be in line with the "wise men" to whose writings he so often alludes (see the many references in the commentary to Proverbs, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus). But it is wisdom in respect to a law—the perfect law of liberty (1²⁵), more fully defined in 2⁸ as the "royal" law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," and obedience to which—the true wisdom—works out in a life "full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy" (3¹⁷).

Summary of Contents. Owing to its unsystematic structure it is difficult to give a summary of the contents of the Epistle as a whole. All that can be here attempted is a list of the topics dealt with; any suggestions as to their interconnection will be best left to the detailed commentary.

1¹. The Salutation.

12-19. Trial; its object and the way to secure wisdom to endure it. Its benefit both to poor and rich. The temptation arising from trial is not to be attributed to God, but to our own desires.

120-27. Preparation for and subsequent conduct to the hearing of the word. The test of true religious service.

21-13. Warning against subservience to the rich.

214-26. Faith and Works.

31-12. Warning against ambition to be teachers; the dangers of speech.

313-412. Warning against strife, and its origin in rivalry and in pleasure-loving.

413-17. In laying plans for our life, God is not to be left out of account.

51-6. Denunciation of those who abuse riches and oppress the poor.

57-11. Exhortation to patience.

512-20. Miscellaneous exhortations in regard to (1) oaths, (2) prayer for the sick, (3) restoration of a fallen brother.

Literature: Mayor, The Epistle of James; Knowling, The Epistle of James; Ropes, The Epistle of James (International Critical Commentary); Plummer, James (Expositor's Bible); Oesterley, James (Expositor's Greek Testament); Articles on "James" in the Bible Dictionaries.

CHAPTER I

1. Epistolary Greeting. On James and on Dispersion see introduction. Servant—the Greek means "a bond-servant" (R.V. mg.). Cf. Rom. 1¹ Phil. 1¹ Tit. 1¹ Jude v. 1. The same word is used in LXX of Moses (Mal. 4⁴) and of the prophets (Amos 3⁷ Jer. 7²⁵), and frequently by our Lord of his disciples, e.g., Lk. 17⁷⁻¹⁰; but cf. Jn. 15¹⁵. It is hard to translate, as "slave" suggests to the English reader the enslaved Negro; and "servant," a hired domestic or farm help; whereas the slaves in the Roman Empire at this time were not of a different race from their masters, and were, on the whole, kindly treated; on the other hand they were the property of their owners, and could not leave their service when they liked. R.V. mg. gives uniformly bond-servant, an unfamiliar word. The Christian is "bought with a price" and so is not his own, but the Lord's. James and Jude by using the word imply that, though brothers of the Lord, they are in no way privileged above their fellow Christians. The phrase of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ implies the belief of James in the divinity and the Messiahship of Jesus. The twelve tribes—see Acts 26⁷ Mt. 19²⁸. Greeting might better be rendered "wishes joy," so as to show the connection with the next verse.

2-4. The Place of Trial in Perfecting the Life. James wishes his readers joy; he is not unmindful of the trials they are suffering, but he reminds them that trials are matter for joy, not for mere resignation, because trial is at once the test and the school of endurance. The athlete enjoys the race, the student enjoys the examination, for they both prove and strengthen his power (cf. Mt. 5¹⁰⁻¹² Rom. 5³ 1 Pet. 1⁶, 7 4¹²⁻¹⁴ Heb. 12¹¹ Eccus. 21⁴). All joy—supreme joy. My brethren—James uses this word nineteen times; he is the brother of the Lord, but all the more he emphasizes the thought that he is the brother of all Christian people, however humble. Temptations (mg., trials)—we discriminate between trials and temptations, but the Greek has only one word for the two. All trials are temptations to murmuring and distrust, as well as to hatred of those who cause them; and all temptations are trials and are bitterly painful to the sensitive soul. In this clause James is thinking of suffering; in vv. 13f. he deals with allurements to sin—temptations in the narrower English sense. Proof (testing)—cf. Wisdom 34⁶ Prov. 27²¹ 2 Cor. 8². Faith—James agrees with Paul in regarding faith as the foundation of the Christian life. Patience, i.e., endurance, steadfastness (cf. Mt. 24¹³ Rom. 12¹²). Perfect—realizing its full purpose; a favorite word with James (cf. Mt. 54⁸ 19²¹ Heb. 2¹⁰). Entire—complete in all its parts (cf. Acts 34⁶ 1 Thess. 52³ Wisdom 15³). It is explained by the next phrase, lacking in nothing.

5-8. Digression on Wisdom and the Way to Attain It. The word lacking suggests to the writer that which is the most fatal lack of all—the lack of wisdom. To him wisdom is what faith is to Paul, hope to Peter, and love to John—the essence of the Christian life. And the four are essentially one. Faith is union with God, and this involves wisdom, which means estimating the values of life from God's standpoint; hope, which is the vision of the future as God intends it; and love, which is the consummation of fellowship with God and through him with his children. In order to rejoice in tribulations, it is necessary to have the wisdom which enables a man to form a true valuation of life from the divine point of view. This view of wisdom as "the principal thing" was no doubt largely due to the author's familiarity with the ideas set out in Proverbs, Wisdom, and Ecclesiasticus (see in particular Prov. 8). This wisdom is the gift of God, not a mere philosophical inference from the facts of life. Hence it is given in answer to prayer. (See pp. 157b, 171-2, 606-8.)

For God as the giver of wisdom see 1 Kings 39-12 Wisdom 7⁷ Eccus. 11⁰; cf. Mt. 7⁷. Liberally—better, unconditionally, without bargaining. Upbraideth not—cf. Eccus. 20¹³ 41²². In faith, i.e., in such close fellowship with God that the believer knows what the will of God is and can be sure that he is asking in accordance with it (1 Jn. 5^{14, 15}). Nothing doubting, or, rather, not at variance with oneself (cf. Mt. 21²¹). This is not a repetition of in faith, but adds another condition—that there must be no division of aim, no double purpose, no failure in whole-hearted and single-minded devotion. In contrast to this is the double-minded man of v. 8 (cf. Eccus. 12⁹ 21²⁻¹⁴). Such a man is like the surge or froth by the seashore—now coming in, now going out, as the waves and the winds drive it hither and thither; a very natural figure for a man who had spent his youth near the sea of Galilee, and perhaps had gone fishing there with his cousins John and James (cf. Eph. 4¹⁴ Eccus. 12⁸).

8. The entire verse is in apposition to that man (R.V.); not as a new sentence (A.V.), or as the subject of shall receive (R.V., mg.). The Greek word for double-minded appears to have been invented by James, but is often used by later Christian writers, and occurs forty times in the Shepherd of Hermas.

9-12. The Author Returns to the Question of Joy in Trial. The majority of the Jewish-Christians were poor and of inferior social position (1 Cor. 12⁶). They are to exult in the spiritual dignity which Christianity has brought to them (Jer. 92³ Lk. 62⁰ 1 Cor. 72² and cf. 25). There were some rich men among them, who probably suffered in social prestige and in their business through their connection with the Christian community. They are to exult in these humiliations, because they are thus reminded of the transitoriness of riches, and so are saved from setting their hearts on earthly things (Jer. 923 Mt. 184 1 Tim. 617). Poor and rich alike, if they endure trial, will receive the crown of life.

The rich, i.e., the rich brother, not the rich non-Christian, who is denounced in 51-6. The flower of the grass—quoted from Isa. 406, which is also quoted more fully in 1 Pet. 124 (cf. Psa. 1024, 11). He shall pass away, i.e., as a rich man. The scorching wind—the sirocco, or southeast wind, common in Palestine (cf. Job 2118 2721). In his goings—perhaps the words mean “in his business journeyings.” The crown of life—in Paul this means the wreath of victory (1 Cor. 925 2 Tim. 25 48), given as a prize in the Greek games; but James would not be likely to refer to these games, which the Jews regarded with abhorrence; he is, rather, thinking of the O.T. use of the word, meaning “a mark of dignity” (Ecclus. 156 Wisdom 28 Prov. 49 Isa. 285 Zech. 611). The crown is eternal life, begun here and to be continued hereafter (1 Pet. 54 Rev. 210d Jn. 1010). The Lord—(Greek, which he hath promised); the implied subject may be God or the Lord—probably the latter; the reference may be to some word of our Lord’s not recorded elsewhere. For the form of the clause cf. Psa. 11 Mt. 53-11.

13-18. The Source of Temptation. The author now turns to what in English we mean by temptation, as distinguished from trial; though in Greek, there is only one word for the two meanings. The man who yields to temptation must not excuse himself on the plea that the temptation is from God; or, in more modern phrase, that his sin is due to heredity or environment. It is unthinkable that God should either himself be tempted or should tempt men (Ecclus. 1511-20). Temptation comes from the lower desires of the flesh and the mind (Gen. 36 Eph. 23 Rom. 85-8) which overcome the higher and more recently developed moral and spiritual instincts, and so generate sin, which in its turn generates death. From God only good can come; in contrast to the monstrous birth of sin from desire, and death from sin, is the Christian’s birth to righteousness, wrought by God through the preaching of the gospel; and it is impossible that God should counterwork his own purpose by tempting his children. Of course we are here face to face with the fundamental problem of divine sovereignty and human free will. James attempts no solution of it; he takes his stand on the moral conviction that God cannot have anything to do with sin, much as Paul meets a very similar difficulty in Rom. 34 77. 13 914 with an indignant “God forbid!”

The R.V. translation of vv. 13, 14 (cf. Psa. 714) is preferable to that in the mg. Lust (v. 15)—this word has become so limited to sexual passion that it is better to substitute for it a more general word, “desire” or “impulse.” The Father of lights (v. 17), rather, of the lights, i.e., the sun and moon (Gen. 114 Psa. 1367-9 Jer. 3135 Ecclus. 431-10); but unlike the sun, which rises and sets, and the moon which waxes and wanes, there is no variation in his changeless goodness (Ecclus. 1726 2711 1 Jn. 15). Shadow cast by turning—i.e., the shadow cast on the face of the moon by the revolution of the heavens. He brought us forth—cf. 1 Pet. 13 Jn. 113 33. The word of truth—as in the next paragraph, James means the perfect law of liberty, i.e., the gospel; cf. 1 Pet. 123 Rom. 1017 Eph. 113 Jn. 831. Firstfruits—which were sacred to God. The early Christians were the firstfruits of the harvest of the world (2 Thess. 213 R.V., mg.). Creatures—a wider word than “men”; it seems to suggest the same thought as Rom. 819, 20.

19-27. Hearing and Doing. The mention of the word of truth suggests the subject of the next paragraph, which deals with the right way of hearing and practicing the word. It must be remembered that there was no N.T. in existence yet; so that the Christians were dependent upon the preaching of traveling missionaries such as are mentioned often in the second-century document known as The Teaching of the Twelve, and of local teachers (Acts 131) for their knowledge of the gospel. To get profit from this they must be ready to hear, slow to obtrude themselves (31), and slow to lose their temper when what is said does not agree with their prejudices (Acts 2222). They must prepare themselves by cleansing their hearts from impurity and malice. And, having heard the word, they must practice it. As to the form of service, they must not be content with outward rites and ceremonies, for the ritual acceptable to God is the practice of kindly help toward orphans and widows and of personal purity and single-mindedness.

Ye know, or, Know ye—probably the indicative is intended (cf. Eph. 55 Heb. 1217). Swift to hear—supply “the word of truth” (Ecclus. 511). Wrath (Ecclus. 119-24)—fanatical opposition to the teacher’s message—a fault not unknown to-day. The righteousness of God—not used in Paul’s technical sense, but of right conduct such as God approves. (Cf. Mt. 520 633.) Putting away—literally, “stripping off,” as a filthy garment, unfit for wearing in the service of God’s house; a common figure (1 Pet. 21 Rom. 13¹² Eph. 4²² Col. 3⁸); the filthy garment is defined by the following words: the overflowing of malice (mg., v. 21). Receive—not simply hear (Jn. 1¹² Acts 17¹¹). The implanted word (Jn. 6⁶³)—the word rooted in the heart, which is the indwelling Christ; he saves the soul from those evil desires, which are the origin of sin (see v. 14).

The figure of the mirror (v. 23) is not so easy for us to understand as it was for the readers of the Epistle. We have mirrors on every dressing-table, and photographs of ourselves in every album; in the older days there were no photographs, and mirrors were rare and costly. An occasional passing glance at their reflection would be all that most of these people got. The law of liberty (v. 25) is the teaching of our Lord, especially as contained in the Sermon on the Mount, which there is abundant evidence in the Epistle that James had heard and remembered; into it we must stoop down (cf. 1 Pet. 1¹²) and look minutely; and in it we shall see reflected our own best ideals, the image of what we ought to be; and by continuing to study it, and trying to conform ourselves to its ideals, we shall grow into the same image. The law of liberty is contrasted with the law of commandments contained in ordinances (Psa. 119⁴³ Mt. 5¹⁷ Acts 15¹⁰ Rom. 8² 2 Cor. 3¹⁶; cf. Jer. 31³³). It is the perfect law, i.e., attaining its end in enabling men to be righteous; which the old Law could not do (Rom. 8³ Heb. 7¹⁹). Religious (v. 26)—exact in religious observances, such as attendance at the synagogue, fasting, carrying out the ritual of the Law, etc. Religion (v. 27)—religious observance. In modern language, going to church and taking the sacrament are of no use, unless a man controls his speech (cf. 32-12). The ritual most acceptable to God is care for widows and orphans (Deut. 27¹⁹ Eccus. 4¹⁰) and purity from the sins of the godless world (5⁴, 5 2 Pet. 2²⁰ 1 Jn. 2¹⁵⁻¹⁷).

CHAPTER II

1-13. Warning Against Subservience to the Rich. The mention of the right way of hearing the word suggests to the author an abuse that he has noted in the public services. The rich man who comes in is shown to a good place, while the poor man is made to stand or sit on the ground. This indicates worldly motives still operating in the conduct of the Christians. They have forgotten the dignity which faith in Christ gives to the poor, and the persecutions which they have suffered from the rich. True, we must love the rich man as being our neighbor; but we must equally love the poor. Neglect of this duty cannot be atoned for by even the most complete obedience to the law in other points. The law we have to observe is a law of liberty; of the spirit, not of the letter; and its spirit is the spirit of mercy. If we treat the poor without mercy, we ourselves shall be judged without mercy; but if we show mercy, God will show mercy to us, even though we have deserved condemnation. How many of our modern churches come under this condemnation! What of pew-rents, seats sold by auction to the highest bidder, free seats in the worst part of the building?

Hold not, or, do ye hold? Both renderings are possible, but the first is the better. Of glory—it is better to take these words as in apposition to our Lord Jesus Christ, i.e., our Lord Jesus Christ who is the Glory. The Glory is used for the Shekinah, the visible glory of God in the Temple, where he sits between the Cherubim (Isa. 45 Rom. 9⁴). So Christ is the manifested Glory of God (Jn. 1¹⁴ Heb. 1³ Col. 1²⁷). In Eph. 1¹⁷ God is called "The Father of the Glory." A possible, but much tamer rendering, is "our glorious Lord Jesus Christ." To one who has through faith seen the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ (2 Cor. 4⁶)

"The glories of our blood and state
Are shadows, not substantial things,"

and he cannot be dazzled by gold rings and raiment of purple and fine linen. Respect of persons—regard for the outward appearance, the mask (persona) of the actor (Lev. 19¹⁵ Acts 10³⁴ Rom. 2¹¹ Eph. 6⁹ Col. 3²⁵ 1 Pet. 1¹⁷).

Synagogue (v. 2)—the gathering of the Jews for worship. (See intro., "Destination.") Strangers were admitted to the synagogue (1 Cor. 14²³), and both the persons referred to here were probably casual visitors. In a good place (v. 3)—cf. Mt. 23⁶. But perhaps the translation should be Please sit down here. Under my footstool—on the ground at my feet. Divided in your own mind (v. 4)—actuated sometimes by pure motives, at others, as in this case, by worldly considerations, evil thoughts. Rich in faith (v. 5)—cf. 1¹⁰ and note. Heirs of the kingdom (Lk. 6²⁰ Rom. 8¹⁷)—the poor are heirs, not because they are poor, but because they are sons of God, and love him (cf. 112). Drag you (v. 6)—the early persecutions of the Christian Jews came from their rich and influential countrymen (Jn. 16² Acts 4¹ 8¹⁻³ 13⁵⁰ 1 Thess. 2¹⁴⁻¹⁶).

Blaspheme (v. 7)—properly "slander"; but often used in N.T. in the modern sense (Acts 13⁴⁵ 18⁶ 26¹¹ 1 Tim. 1¹³). The honorable name—Jesus; which (R.V., mg.) was called upon you, i.e., in baptism (Acts 23⁸ 54¹ Phil. 29¹¹). As blasphemy is associated with the divine name, this passage implies that James accepted the divinity of Jesus. Cf. Amos 9¹² and Acts 15¹⁷, where James uses the same phrase. The royal law (v. 8)—the supreme law (Mt. 22^{39, 40} Rom. 13⁸), or, better, the law given, not to slaves, but to those who are kings (25), and, therefore, a law of liberty (125). The scripture—Lev. 19¹⁸. Ye do well—James uses a similar expression in Acts 15²⁹. Convicted by the laws (v. 9)—Lev. 19¹⁵⁻¹⁸. Guilty of all (v. 10)—so R. Jochanan in Sabbath 70² says, "If a man does all things, but omits one, he is guilty of each and all." The law of liberty (v. 12)—cf. 125. The law of the spirit, the law of love, not of specific ordinances. To transgress against love is to transgress the whole law. Judgment is without mercy (Mt. 5⁷ 7² 1834)—but if the law of love is observed, mercy will pardon the sins which otherwise would incur judgment (Tobit 49 Heb. 6¹⁰).

14-26. Faith and Works. The mention of faith in v. 1 above, and the demonstration that faith must involve the observance of the law of love, lead to this discussion of the general relation between faith and works. But there is a change in the meaning of faith, which has given rise to much misunderstanding. Faith means sometimes assent to a proposition, sometimes a trust in Christ which results in union with him (faith into Christ), and reliance upon him for salvation (faith upon Christ). This second meaning is the usual one in the writings of Paul and John; and this is the faith of 16 21. 5. But in this passage it is plain from v. 19 that James is thinking of acceptance of a creed; and it is this sort of faith that is shared by the demons, and cannot save them or anyone else; in other words, what James means is that orthodoxy is of no use at all unless it leads to and is manifested by good works. A creed can no more save a man's soul than a fine speech can feed the hungry or clothe the naked. It may perhaps be suggested that faith and works are separate gifts of co-ordinate value, like, e.g., the gifts of tongues and of healing; one man has one, another the other. James replies that they are inseparable; faith cannot be proved except by works, and a faith like that of the demons, which does not result in good works, produces nothing but terror. Abraham and Rahab were justified; i.e., their faith was proved to be genuine, by the acts that accompanied it. Faith and works can no more exist apart than the body and the spirit.

Paul is as emphatic as James on this point (see Gal. 5^{6, 22}). His contrast is not between good works and faith but between the works of the Law (the observance of the old Jewish Law), and the righteousness which results from faith in Christ (Rom. 3^{21, 22} 6¹² 8¹²). The theology of James is not as fully developed as that of Paul, but there is no real contradiction between them. (See pp. 936-7.)

Works—good deeds, not what Paul calls "works of the law" (Mt. 5¹⁶ 2 Esdras 97). Naked—insufficiently clothed (Isa. 20² Jn. 217 Mt. 25³⁶). Go in peace—the ordinary salutation, "Good-bye!" In itself (v. 17)—inwardly. Yea, a man will say, or (R.V., mg., v. 18), But some one will say. Two questions arise: (1) Who is this man? an objector or an ally? (2) Where does his speech end? The sentence "But some one will say" usually introduces an objection (Rom. 9¹⁹ 11¹⁹ and especially 1 Cor. 15³⁵), and it is best to take it so here, as has been done in the summary above. James's answer then begins "Shew me thy faith," etc. Thou and I are used in the sense of one and another. If the speaker is an ally, he must be supposed to be addressing the person censured by James—"Thou hast faith, while I (the ally of James) have works; but since thy faith cannot be demonstrated by works it is practically dead, whereas my works prove that I have faith as well." Or we may take the first phrase as a question—"Hast thou faith?" to which James answers, I have works, etc.

God is one (v. 19)—the primary article of the Jewish creed, expressed in the Shema (Deut. 6⁴); cf. the opening of the Nicene Creed. Demons—evil spirits; for their faith and terror see Mt. 8²⁹ Mk. 12⁴ Acts 19¹⁵. Wilt thou know—art thou willing to accept a decisive proof? The proof is given from the history of Abraham and of Rahab. For Abraham's faith see 1 Macc. 2⁵² Wisdom 10⁵ Eccclus. 44²⁰ Rom. 4³ Gal. 3⁶ Heb. 11⁸. Here it is the sacrifice of Isaac (Gen. 22¹⁻¹⁸) that proves Abraham's faith; in Rom. 4 it is his faith in the promise of a son; in Heb. 11⁸ it is his leaving his own land for an unknown country. Justified (v. 21)—not in the technical Pauline sense, but as in Mt. 11¹⁹ Lk. 7²⁹, "shown to be just." Made perfect—by the production of its proper fruit. The Scripture—Gen. 15⁶ (LXX) Rom. 4³. Friend of God (v. 23)—the words do not occur in O.T. (cf. Gen. 18¹⁷) but the designation was a common one among the Jews; cf. the Arab name for "Abraham," El Khalil, i.e., "the friend." Rahab (Josh. 2, Heb. 11³¹)—she is selected as being a woman, an alien, and a harlot—at the furthest remove from Abraham. Spirit—James uses "spirit" (pneuma) for the non-material part of man; not in the Pauline sense of the higher moral nature, as opposed to the soul (psyche). Cf. Gen. 27. It might be translated breath. The point is not that faith is the body and works the soul, but that the two are inseparable, and must concur in all human activities.

CHAPTER III

1-12. Warning Against the Ambition to Become Teachers. In young and isolated churches there is always a danger that zealous but ignorant men may set themselves up as teachers. Many religious leaders have had to meet this tendency among their followers. There is the same danger to be guarded against in the churches to-day. Zeal and piety are not sufficient qualifications for a teacher without due study and preparation. (See pp. 1276-7.)

James points out that teachers will be judged with greater severity than others. Sins of speech are only too easily committed. The tongue is like a horse's bridle or the rudder of a ship—small in size, but able to control the direction of the movement of the whole body. It is like the tiny spark which sets a whole forest aflame. So a trifling word may set on fire the whole round of mortal life; and the devil is ever on the lookout to kindle that fire. Savage and venomous animals may be tamed; but the tongue is more active and venomous than any of them, and cannot be tamed. It has, further, the monstrous and unnatural power to combine the blessing of God with the cursing of our fellowmen; like a spring at once salt and fresh, or a tree which bears two opposite kinds of fruit.

Teachers—we find teachers in the church at Antioch (Acts 13¹), and the title, equivalent to the Aramaic "Rabbi," was given to the itinerant teachers mentioned in The Teaching of the Twelve. For the danger from unauthorized teachers, cf. Mt. 23⁸ Acts 15²⁴ 1 Tim. 16. 7 Heb. 5¹². We (v. 1)—i.e., we who are teachers. Perfect—because one who can bridle his tongue can a fortiori control all his actions. Bridle (v. 2)—cf. 126 Prov. 10¹⁹ Ecclus. 51³ 19¹⁶ Mt. 12³⁶ 15⁴. Now if—another, and in some ways preferable, reading is Behold. Rudder (v. 4)—the same comparison is made by Pseudo-Aristotle, Mechan. 5, and other Greek moralists. Impulse—or pressure of the hand on the tiller. Boasteth great things (v. 5)—plumes itself on its great power. How much wood—or, How great a forest. Bush fires were common in Palestine. Cf. Ps. 83¹⁴ Isa. 9¹³ 10¹⁷. We in Australia know too well how hundreds of square miles of bush may be consumed by a spark from a locomotive engine, or a match thrown into the grass before it has quite gone out.

The tongue is a fire (Prov. 16¹³ Ecclus. 28¹³⁻²⁶)—R.V. text (v. 6) puts the stop after fire; R.V. mg. puts it after iniquity. Either rendering is possible; but the one in the text seems better. The world of iniquity—i.e., the wicked world; cf. Lk. 16⁹; the meaning is "In our little world of man the tongue represents the unrighteous world, for it is through the tongue that we come into relation with the wicked world, both by hearing what others say, and conversing with them, and so become defiled" (cf. 127 4⁴ 1 Jn. 5¹⁹). The wheel of nature—the whole round of life. Hell—Gehenna; as "Heaven" is used for "God," so "hell" is used for "the devil." The tongue is the world (in the bad sense in which James always uses that word); our members are the flesh, and hell is the devil; so that we have here the three sources of evil—the world, the flesh, and the devil. Poison (v. 8)—cf. Ps. 58⁴ 140³ Rom. 3¹³. In the likeness of God (Gen. 12⁶ Wisdom 22³). Ought not so to be—because such inconsistency is unnatural, as is shown by the examples of the spring and the tree (cf. Mt. 7¹⁶ 12³³). Sweet—fresh.

13-18. Warning Against Strife and Party Spirit. True wisdom is shown by meekness and the absence of jealousy and faction. Strife arises from evil desires, and from worldliness. Our spirit covets the goods of others, and so leads to envy. But the grace of God can overcome our natural disposition; therefore submit to God and resist the devil. Draw near to God in humble penitence and sorrow, and he will exalt you.

Wise—in the sense of 15; the possessor of the wisdom which in James's thought is equivalent to religion. Life—conduct; conversation in the old English sense (1 Pet. 11⁵, 18 32, 16 Gal. 11³). Meekness—cf. 12¹ 1 Pet. 3¹⁶ 2 Tim. 2²⁴ Ecclus. 31⁷. Faction (v. 14)—party spirit (cf. Phil. 11⁷). Lie not—by making a profession of wisdom which is proved false by your conduct. Wisdom (v. 15)—the same contrast between earthly and heavenly wisdom is drawn in 1 Cor. 2⁶. Earthly—derived from the finite world of human life (Jn. 8²³ Phil. 3¹⁹ 1 Cor. 15⁴⁷). Sensual—arising from the Psyche, or animal soul, which man shares with the lower creatures (1 Cor. 2¹⁴ 15⁴⁴⁻⁴⁶ Jude v. 19). Cf. Gen. 26, where the temptation appeals to the lower psychic motives; and Eph. 2^{2, 3}, where the desires of the flesh and of the mind correspond to the psychic motives, and are, as here, connected with the devil. Confusion—anarchy (18 38 2 Cor. 12²⁰). Pure (v. 17)—Wisdom 7²⁵. Peaceable—Mt. 5⁹ Rom. 8⁶. Gentle—considerate, sweetly reasonable (2 Cor. 10¹). Easy to be entreated—rather, "ready to obey," submissive to discipline. Without variance—undivided, whole-hearted (16²⁴). Without hypocrisy—unfeigned (1 Pet. 12² 2 Cor. 6⁶). The fruit of righteousness—the reward which righteousness brings (Prov. 11³⁰ Heb. 12¹¹ Phil. 11¹). Them that make peace (Mt. 5⁹).

CHAPTER IV

1-10. The Warnings Continued. In this paragraph, already summarized above, James describes the cause and cure of the strife and quarrelsomeness he has just rebuked. The cause of strife is the selfish love of pleasure, which produces inward conflict between the various pleasures that crave for indulgence, and outward conflict with others who stand in the way of their satisfaction (1 Pet. 2¹¹).

Lust—desire; lust is limited in modern usage to sexual desire, while the word here is quite general and includes all desires for self-gratification (cf. 1¹⁴); v. 2 in R.V. puts a colon after have not; it is better to put the colon after kill. The translation will then be, “Ye desire and have not; and so ye murder. Yea, ye covet and cannot obtain; and so ye fight and war.” It seems unlikely that even these factious Christians would commit murder to gain their desires. But possibly James had in mind the teaching of Jesus in Mt. 5²¹; (cf. 1 Jn. 3¹⁵.) Hate is potential murder. The change of one letter in the Greek word translated “murder” would give a word that might be translated “envy.” With this change, the verse might be rendered, “Ye desire and have not and this gives rise to envy; ye covet and can not obtain, and then ye fight and war.” Many commentators adopt this emendation. Ask not (Mt. 7⁷)—the promise is not fulfilled, because you ask wrongly (1 Jn. 5¹⁴). Adulteresses—the idea that God is the husband of his people is common in the O.T. (Jer. 3²⁰ Ezek. 16 Hos. 2); and in the N.T. the church is the Lamb’s wife (2 Cor. 11² Eph. 5²³ Rev. 19⁷). Hence faithlessness to God is adultery; and those who are faithless are adulteresses (Mt. 12³⁹).

Vv. 5, 6 have received many interpretations, which cannot be discussed in detail in our limited space. The one which involves fewest difficulties is as follows: “Do ye think that the Scripture speaks idly in denouncing friendship with the world? The spirit, i.e., the immaterial part of man, which God made to dwell in us at the creation (Gen. 2⁷) has desires which lead to envy (v. 2). But God will add to his original gift the gift of greater grace, by which these desires can be controlled.” James does not use the word spirit in relation to the Holy Spirit but to the human soul, as in 2²⁶. He saith, i.e., God saith (Prov. 3³⁴; quoted also in 1 Pet. 5⁵). The devil—cf. 3¹⁵ where the devil is the instigator of evil in us (see note, 3⁶). Draw nigh (v. 8)—used specially of the priestly office (Ex. 19²²). Hence the need for purity. Double-minded—cf. 1⁸ Mt. 6²². Be afflicted—endure hardship by giving up the pleasures that lead to strife (1 Cor. 9²⁷). Humble yourselves—cf. 1 Pet. 5⁶.

11, 12. Charity in Judgment. Evil speaking must not be indulged in, as it is contrary to the law of love, and implies criticism of that law. This is a detached section, which some think should come after 2¹³. Speak against—Wisdom 11¹ Psa. 10¹⁵ Mt. 7¹ Rom. 14¹⁰⁻¹³ 2 Cor. 12²⁰ 1 Pet. 2¹ 3¹⁶. The law—i.e., the law of love (cf. 1²⁵ 2⁸). To break the law is to condemn at once the law and the lawgiver. Who art thou?—cf. Rom. 14⁴.

13-17. Recognition of God. God must not be shut out from our plans for carrying on our business. Religion and business must not be kept in separate water-tight compartments. The Jews of the Dispersion were mostly engaged in commerce, and traveled from town to town in the pursuit of their occupation.

Go to—a call to attention; only used here and in 5¹ in N.T. Vapor—cf. Job. 7⁷ Wisdom 24 5⁸⁻¹⁴. The meaning is “mist,” rather than “smoke.” If the Lord will—a common formula among the ancient Greeks; cf. the modern Arabic Inshallah, and the Latin Deo volente (D.V.). The sin is, however, in the thought, and is not avoided by the perfunctory use of a “D.V.” or “God willing” in our announcements. Vauntings—insolent presumptions (cf. Prov. 27¹ Mt. 6³⁴).

V. 17 is a general maxim, applying to all the warnings and advices hitherto given in the Epistle. Sins of omission are just as culpable as sins of commission (cf. Mt. 7²⁶ Lk. 12⁴⁷). Moffatt would transfer this verse to the end of ch. 2.

CHAPTER V.

1-6. Wealthy Tyrants. Denunciation of the rich not for the possession of wealth, but for the way in which, like some of their modern representatives, they have made their money by withholding their wages from their employees, and for spending it in luxury (cf. Amos 5¹¹ 8⁴ Wisdom 2 Lk. 6²⁴ 18²⁴ 1 Tim. 6^{9, 10}). These rich men were Jews who attended the synagogue, but not necessarily Christians, though some of them may have been so by profession.

Miseries that are coming upon you, i.e., in the days of the Messiah (cf. v. 8). Moth-eaten—Mt. 6¹⁹. In the last days—it is better to put a full stop after “flesh” (v. 3) and to translate, “You have treasured up fire in the last days,” i.e., in the days immediately preceding the coming of the Lord. Their accumulated wealth is a fire that will destroy them. Hire—cf. Deut. 24¹⁵ Mal. 3⁵ Eccles. 34^{21, 22}. Lord of Sabaoth—Lord of the hosts of heaven; a common title of Jehovah in O.T.; quoted here from Isa. 59. In a day of slaughter—cf. v. 3, Jer. 123 2534. The day of slaughter is the day of divine vengeance which precedes the coming of the Messiah, which James thought of as now imminent. The righteous one—the rich Jews may have caused some of the poorer brethren to be put to death by false accusations. Some take the righteous one to mean our Lord, but this is not likely. James himself was called "The Just," and it is possible that this verse is a later insertion referring to his murder by the Jews.

7-11. The Need of Patience. By the example of the farmer, and in the expectation of the speedy coming of the Lord, James exhorts his readers to patience. The sufferers must not murmur, even against their oppressors, but endure like the prophets and Job, whose patience was richly recompensed in the end.

The coming of the Lord—the "Parousia," which, like all the early Christians, James expected to take place in a very short time (v. 8; cf. 1 Pet. 47). Early and latter rain—in October and April (Deut. 1114 Jer. 524). That ye be not judged (Mt. 71)—the judge, the Messiah, who will judge both the poor and their oppressors, is at hand (Mt. 2433). The prophets (v. 10)—cf. Mt. 512 2334-39 Acts 752 Heb. 1132f. Job was a stock example of patient endurance under trial. The end of the Lord—his final treatment of Job (Job 4210). Some have imagined a reference to the death of Christ, but this is highly improbable.

12. This is practically quoted from Mt. 533f.; cf. Ecclus. 239.

13-18. Prayer and Praise. In trouble, pray; in cheerfulness, sing. Special directions are given for the treatment of the sick.

Sing praise—properly, sing to the accompaniment of the lyre; but used generally for singing praise (Eph. 519 1 Cor. 1415). The elders, i.e., of the synagogue, which James assumes to be in this case a Jewish-Christian assembly. At first the Christian churches followed the precedent of the synagogues in their organization, and the elders were the official leaders (Acts 2017). Anointing him with oil—oil was the commonest of remedies (cf. Isa. 16 Lk. 1034). The modern equivalent would be "Giving him his medicine in the name of the Lord." Ordinary remedies are not to be omitted, but reinforced by prayer. There is no justification here for extreme unction, which is given, not to cure the sick, but to prepare them for death. Confess your sins one to another (v. 16)—not to a priest. Confession of sin is the best method of curing many diseases, and is the foundation of modern treatment by psychoanalysis. In its working—probably the word is passive and means "when energized by the Holy Spirit"; prayer can be successful only when it is according to the will of God (1 Jn. 514); and this we can know only through the guidance of the Spirit (1 Cor. 211). Elijah—1 Kings 171 1842, 43. It is to be noted that Elijah knew the will of God before he prayed.

19, 20. By turning a sinner from the error of his ways, the converter saves the sinner's soul from death, and secures the forgiveness of his (the sinner's) sins. It is possible that the last clause refers to the sins of the converter (cf. Prov. 1012 Dan. 123 1 Tim. 416 1 Pet. 48). It was a common Jewish belief that almsgiving and prayer for others brought forgiveness to the man who so helped another.

FIRST PETER

BY PROFESSOR BENJAMIN W. ROBINSON

INTRODUCTION

The Purpose of the Epistle: A Plea for Fortitude. This Epistle, originally written to hearten and encourage early Christians in a time of special affliction, has become one of the world's greatest expressions of the glory of fortitude in enduring the hardships of life. As the key word to the understanding of the Epistle of Jude is "antinomianism" (lawlessness), and as Second Peter centers in the "promise of Jesus' coming" (34), so First Peter unlocks its spiritual treasures to one who holds constantly in mind the word "persecution" (17 412).

There is no more rewarding study in all the field of religion than that of the problem of suffering. The book of Job offers one solution, namely, that God lets his children be afflicted to prove their loyalty. In the Suffering Servant of Isa. 53 the problem is solved by the expression of the conviction that suffering finds its glorification in service to others. There were many attempts among early Christians to explain the sufferings of Jesus. Chief among them was the idea that he suffered because of the sins and shortcomings of others.

Later comments will indicate that First Peter has many different ways of stating Peter's solution of the problem of suffering. Foremost among them is his positive and convincing way of saying that suffering is a means of purifying and ennobling the soul (17). It brings us into closer fellowship with Jesus, and so helps us to attain that higher life which Jesus imparts (21-11). "One who really suffers ceases from sin and lives the rest of his life in harmony with God's will" (41, 2).

The Background of Persecution. Christians in Pontus, Galatia, and other provinces of Asia Minor were undergoing a time of testing. "You have now been put to grief in manifold trials in order that your faith may be found more precious than gold when tested with fire" (16, 7). "Do not think it strange that a fiery test is being put upon you" (412). Among the countless papyrus sheets discovered in recent years containing letters and records from the early centuries, are many little pieces called libelli. They are the signed statements of individuals who made affidavit in the time of the Decian persecution that they were not worshippers of Jesus or of the Christian God.

One of these signed statements, mentioned by Milligan (Here and There Among the Papyri, p. 142), reads in part as follows: "To the Sacrifice Officials: Aurelia Demos, wife of Aurelius Irenæus, makes affidavit that it has always been my custom to offer sacrifices to the gods, and I have now in your presence, according to your command, offered sacrifice and libation, and have partaken of the offering." It is not likely that people who were not associating with Christians would be suspected. The probability is that many who had been Christians in name did in a cowardly fear obey the command to offer incense. (See intro. to Revelation, p. 1365, and cf. pp. 755, 846b.)

It so happens that we have a letter written by the governor of Bithynia, the province mentioned in 11, written in the year 110 A.D. to the Roman emperor, about the Christians: "With those who have been brought before me as Christians, I have pursued the following course: I have asked them if they were Christians, and if they have confessed, I have asked them a second and a third time, threatening them with punishment: If they have persisted, I have commanded them to be led away to punishment." (For further discussion, see B. W. Robinson, The Life of Paul, p. 160.)

Who shall say how many were saved from a cowardly surrender by the triumphant faith and conviction conveyed in such an epistle as this of Peter? If many fell away, the church was purified and made stronger. This Epistle and the spirit pervading it made the victory sure. In every age, the Spirit of Jesus expressing itself through his followers assures the triumph of the higher kind of life and more and more ennobles human experience.

First Peter is best understood as a revelation of a great historical situation in which the purer and higher triumphed over the baser and the worse. The Epistle is no longer viewed merely as a statement of doctrine by a single author. History proves that the Epistle found response in the hearts of a great multitude. This is shown not merely by the fact that Christianity triumphed over all persecution, but also by the fact that the Epistle was preserved and taken into the canon of Scripture. In a very real sense it may be said that First Peter is the triumphant song of countless heroes who saved the world from militarism and materialism, setting up an ideal of spiritual fellowship and brotherhood which is still marching toward the great victory.

The Author of the Epistle. First Peter was in use in the churches in the first half of the second century. Polycarp makes several quotations from it (see his Ep. to Philippians, chs. 1, 2, 8, 10, Ante-Nicene Fathers, Eng. trans., vol. i). According to Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., iii, 39) it was used by Papias. There are two difficulties with the view that Peter was the author of the Epistle. (1) Peter probably died in the time of Nero, about 64 A.D. But there was no official persecution of Christians in Asia Minor until the time of Domitian in the last decade of the first century. (2) The Epistle is written in a very pure and fine Greek style. It is not easy to think of the Galilæan fisherman becoming such a master of a language which was not his mother tongue.

The first of these difficulties may be answered by the statement that there is no reference in the Epistle to a systematic persecution, or to shedding of blood. The references to persecution may be understood as referring to such a situation as may have developed under Nero, or even earlier. Paul himself as early as the year 50 makes definite reference to persecution and suffering in Thessalonica (1 Thess. 2¹⁴, 15).

The second item, regarding the Greek style, is easily explained by the part which Silvanus had in the writing of the Epistle. The statement is plainly made in 5¹² that it is Silvanus who is doing the actual writing.

The modern reader of the Epistle has no difficulty in the matter of authorship. Anything in it which does not sound like a direct word of the apostle Peter may be regarded as due to the work of Silvanus. He was Greek, as his name shows. He may have been the same Silvanus (called Silas in Acts) who accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey.

Silvanus may either have written at Peter's dictation, or have been told by Peter to write the Epistle. It is even conceivable (as suggested by von Soden) that Silvanus may have written after the death of Peter. In any case, the Epistle stands forth in all its glory as an expression of that remarkable fortitude which Peter manifested in his imprisonment and endurance of every kind of persecution, even to his death by crucifixion.

Date and Destination. The date of the letter is somewhat uncertain. If it is thought that the persecution was that of Domitian, it must have been written near the end of the first century. But as great an historian as Mommsen has said that the situation revealed in the letter may be as early as the time of Nero (64 A.D.). Most scholars find no serious difficulty with the date of 64 A.D., within the lifetime of Peter (cf. Bigg, St. Peter and St. Jude).

The provinces to which the Epistle is addressed should not be understood in too limited a way. The list does not mean that the bearer of the letter went first to Pontus and when it had been read there, went on to Galatia and then to the other provinces mentioned. The Epistle is rather a general one for the use of all Christians wherever found, who were subjected to trials.

The Content of the Epistle. The Epistle is best understood when read as a whole. It is not so much a collection of individual texts as it is the following of a lofty line of thought. The spirit of the letter is hope and triumph. There is no effort to deny the reality of the persecution. The author had known the sufferings of Christ and had, through his own experience, become a partaker in the Christian triumph. There was in his mind that promise to the sons of Zebedee that they should drink the cup which Jesus drank (Mt. 20^{20f.}). There was perhaps also in his mind that word in Jn. 21¹⁸: "When thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not." The fiery trial makes those who experience it partakers of Christ's sufferings, so that they may rejoice and may share in the revelation of his glory (cf. Fowler, History and Literature of N.T., p. 264).

The general content, stated in unconventional terms, is somewhat as follows:

Peter, a messenger of Jesus, sends greetings to the Christians in the provinces of Asia (1¹, 2).

We offer thanks to God for the everlasting blessings which we have inherited from Jesus, and for the reward and glory which are soon to be ours. Your persecutions and trials, though manifold, are but temporary. Their purpose is to purify, as fire purifies gold. Jesus, whom you love without having seen, sheds a joy in your hearts and through him your souls are saved. Prophets have long foreseen that, after a time of suffering, there comes a time of glory when the Spirit of Jesus triumphs (13-12).

Keep your minds and hearts upon the higher level, obeying the commands of Jesus. Do not give way to your former temptations and weaknesses, but live like Jesus in the holiness of the Father. Remember that Jesus shed his lifeblood for you. As he triumphed over death, so shall you with him rise above your inherited desires and your sufferings (13-21).

To your purity of soul, add a deep spirit of love and service one for another and remember that you are living a higher kind of life that is above the realm of the flesh (12¹⁻²⁵). You have been born into a new life. Feed on the spiritual milk which is not adulterated, that you may grow rapidly and become healthy. You are stones in a new building, a living temple, of which Jesus is the corner stone. You are a holy priesthood offering spiritual sacrifices. You are God's chosen people called out of darkness into his marvelous light (21-10).

Be sure that you honor the name of Christ in all your living. Do your duty in public and private. If persecuted, endure it with fortitude. Jesus is your example. When he was reviled he reviled not again. He died that we might live. By his stripes you are healed (21¹⁻²⁵).

Let wives and husbands live in peace with each other. Be sympathetic toward all, do not return evil for evil, keep your lips from unclean or violent words (31-12).

Who will harm you if you do what is right? And if you do suffer for uprightness, do not be afraid, but reverence Jesus. Make your defense respectfully as he did and keep your conscience clear. It is better to suffer for doing right than for doing wrong. That is the way Jesus suffered, and he is now in heaven at the right hand of God (31³⁻²²).

You have spent time enough in the past in unchristian dissipation. Men are surprised that you no longer consort with them in these things. That is the reason they speak evil of you (41-6).

But the end is not far away. Be serious and take time for prayer. Keep your spirit of love vigorous. Love covers a host of shortcomings. Serve each other with all the power of God's Spirit (47-11).

Do not think it strange that a fiery test is upon you. It makes you partners of Christ's sufferings. Punishment for murder or theft is a disgrace, but suffering as a Christian glorifies Christ and God and him who suffers (41²⁻¹⁹).

As a fellow elder I exhort the elders among you to tend the flock of God, not for money but in the spirit of the Great Shepherd. To the rest of you, I appeal to be loyal to your elders. Put your worry and anxiety in God's hand, and he, after your brief suffering, will make you perfect (51-11).

Written by the hand of Silvanus. The church in Babylon sends greetings.

Literature: (The simpler books are listed first; the more critical and those based upon the Greek text are put last.) Goodspeed, The New Testament, An American Translation; Hastings, Dictionary of the Apostolic Church, article, "First Peter"; Fowler, History and Literature of N.T., pp. 259-266; Kent, Work and Teachings of the Apostles, pp. 248-250; Cone, International Hand Books to N.T., vol. iii, pp. 297i.; Mitchell, First Peter (Westminster N.T.); Moffatt, Introduction to Literature of N.T., pp. 315-344; Hort, Commentary on First Peter; Hart, First Peter, in Expositor's Greek Testament, vol. iv; Bigg, St. Peter and St. Jude (International Critical Commentary).

CHAPTER I

1, 2. The Writer Sends Greetings. The Epistle is addressed to the "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion." The word elect means chosen by God, and should be understood in the particularly personal sense of "invited ones." Sojourners recalls Gen. 23⁴ and Psal. 39¹². As Abraham was a sojourner, so Christians are pilgrims who have been "invited" to the land of promise.

The Dispersion would literally refer to Jews who had become Christians. But the term here plainly refers to all Christians, Gentile or Jew (cf. p. 847). It became the favorite custom among early Christians to carry over such terms from Judaism into a spiritual application to Christianity (cf. Jas. 1¹). Pontus: The provinces named cover practically the whole of Asia Minor.

Peter here understands the Christian salvation to include (a) God's plan of the work, (b) the Spirit, and (c) the ministry of Jesus. Sanctification is a word of long and rich history (see Bible Dictionary). It indicates that the Spirit not only cleanses, but imbues with a sort of divine antisepsis which renders the soul immune to the contamination of the world. Blood: Westcott has well said that the blood represents the energy of the physical, earthly life. This means that Christians are saved not alone through an atonement, but through receiving the life and Spirit of Jesus into their souls (Rom. 5¹⁰).

3-12. Trial and Suffering Bring Spiritual Blessing. The second birth into a new life through the resurrection of Jesus is also portrayed in Jn. 3, in the story of Jesus' talk with Nicodemus. There is also a close relation here to Paul's teaching that Christians rise with Jesus in newness of life (Rom. 6⁴). Fowler has pointed out that the words of vv. 3 and 4 are a graphic reminder of Peter's own experience. Peter had denied his Lord and had gone out into the darkness and wept bitterly. With all his hope gone, he had returned to Galilee to resume his former life of fishing. Then it was to Peter first that the risen Jesus came (1 Cor. 15⁵), with his message of life and hope.

The paragraph goes on to describe the inheritance incorruptible which Christians receive through the power of God, the pure and eternal fellowship with Jesus which is God's gift out of heaven (vv. 4, 5). The greatness of this gift is not to be weighed against sufferings; rather our various trials are to be undergone as a means of purifying and thus making more precious the spiritual inheritance which is ours (vv. 6, 7).

Whom not having seen, ye love (v. 8). This has become one of the watchwords of Christianity. It is a remarkable expression of a purely spiritual love and a spiritual religion. Salvation (v. 9). This is a word which has a long history in Greek and Roman as well as Christian thought. Here, "salvation" is both present and future, both personal and social. The higher spiritual life upon which Christians enter here and now comes to its perfection in the future revelation of Jesus (v. 7). The prophets (v. 10). God does not change his mind, nor subject his children to whims of his will. Prophets of old have revealed the heart of God, have told of the relation of suffering to glory. Now the Holy Spirit (v. 12) has brought the good news with a plainness and clearness never before known.

13-25. Jesus as the Great Example. In these verses, the author gives his central message. Jesus suffered even to his death upon the cross, and has become the Saviour of the world. If Christians can be holy (v. 13), if they will lead lives of devotion and faith and hope, if they will purify their souls in a sincere love of the brethren (v. 22), God will grant them to share in the glory of Jesus.

13-16. The practical nature of the author's meaning is clear. His purpose is to win his readers away from their lower and physical desires and bring them to the higher manner of living.

17-21. These verses, and especially the words redeemed with blood, convey one of the most precious doctrines of the Christian religion. "Redeemed" means emancipated. The redemption of a slave out of his bondage was a common occurrence among the Greeks and the Romans. It was indeed a joyous occasion on which some slave, after years of servitude, came to the day when, through the generosity of a friend, or as a reward for unusual service, he found himself officially set free. This is a picture of what Jesus can do for anyone who enters into fellowship with him. It is Jesus' life, his life of holiness and service, which emancipates our souls. He poured out his life with utter unselfishness, even to the cross. "Blood" is a word filled with life and meaning (see v. 2, note). It is Jesus' self-sacrifice which saves.

His followers, in union with him, receive his spirit of unselfish service and, as they attain the higher life, God wipes away their shortcomings. (See Hastings, Encyc. of Religion and Ethics, art., "Blood.")

22-25. The emphasis upon love of the brethren is again united to the conception of the second birth. Compare the word of Jesus to Nicodemus: "That which is born of the flesh, is flesh" (Jn. 3⁶). Flesh perishes, but the higher Christian spirit and life are imperishable. This is the Christian "gospel" (v. 25), which endures forever because it is the word of the ever-enduring God.

CHAPTER II

1-10. You are God's New Spiritual Temple.

In these verses, Peter describes the Christian life in three successive figures: (1) second birth, (2) a living temple, and (3) a royal priesthood. Spiritual milk (v. 2). The idea of regeneration is a very frequent thought, not only in this Epistle (1³ 12³) and in other parts of the N.T., but also in other religions of the Roman Empire. For example, in the Mysteries of Attis, the ancestral religion of central Asia Minor, the district to which this Epistle was addressed, milk was taken during the regular religious service, as a sort of sacrament. The purpose of the sacrament was to impress upon the hearts and minds of the worshipers the thought that they had entered upon a new life, in which they would find nourishment and growth. (See art., Backgrounds, p. 851.) Without guile. This is one of the expressions which has received light and meaning from the study of the papyri (Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 256). The word is found in the simple sense of unadulterated. It should be so taken in this passage—"unadulterated milk" (but cf. A.S.V. mg.).

Judaism had its magnificent Temple at Jerusalem, in the early days of the Christian religion. Christianity had no temple. One of Paul's favorite figures (v. 4) is that of the Christian spiritual temple. 1 Cor. 3¹⁰⁻¹⁷: "Ye are God's temple"; Eph. 2²⁰: "Jesus is the chief cornerstone" (cf. Mt. 21⁴² Mk. 12¹⁰ Lk. 20^{17,1}). It is noticeable that the language expresses a fulfillment of the prophecy of Jn. 2¹⁹, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (cf. Mk. 14⁵⁸). A living stone. This phrase is to be taken with whom and refers to Jesus. The meaning of the rather involved sentence is: Come to Jesus, the living stone, and you also as living stones will build with him a living temple.

Spiritual sacrifices (v. 5). The verse would indicate that the author had read Rom. 12¹. The words "living," "spiritual sacrifice" are found both there and here. It is the word "spiritual" of v. 2 which seems to be an echo of the same word in the Romans passage. There are many such echoes of Pauline expressions in 1 Peter. Peter builds up his picture of the spiritual temple in a vigorous and vivid way. His readers cannot but feel the responsibility and the honor which God had laid upon these simple people of Asia Minor, through whom was to be carried on and fully realized the purpose which had been frustrated by the disobedience of others.

11-25. Live as Citizens of a Higher Heavenly Community. The author here turns to a long series of practical precepts for Christian living. These have been often misunderstood and much abused. The key of the approach to these verses is to be found in the expression, sojourners and pilgrims (v. 11). As the Jews of the Dispersion were "sojourners" (11) in various lands, so Christians have their loyalty to their spiritual temple, and are but pilgrims, so far as these other matters are concerned. Physical desires (v. 11) are but strangers, among whom Christian souls dwell for a brief while. Like-wise civil ordinances are but secondary (vv. 13-17). Christians should be willing to die, if necessary, rather than obey a governor's order to offer sacrifice to the emperor. But this superior citizenship and responsibility should not be used as a cloak to wickedness. They must show by purity of life that their opposition to certain ordinances is based on conscience, not on a desire to be lawless. (See notes on Rom. 13, and cf. intro. to Revelation, p. 1365.)

18-25. In subjection to your masters (v. 18). Peter urges that this subjection be shown not only to good masters but also to severe ones. H. G. Wells, in his Outline of History (p. 512), states that the N.T. has condoned the institution of slavery. If Wells were right, we should expect to find a definite description of the institution of slavery as a part of the expected kingdom of God on earth. Paul and others, to the contrary, state repeatedly that in the Christian commonwealth there is no such distinction as that of master and slave (Gal. 3:28 Eph. 6:8 Col. 3:11 1 Cor. 12:13). What the present passage advises is self-control and patience even in the service of severe masters. When you are reviled, do not use the same base language which has hurt you. Jesus bore in his body the sins of others, and through it all gave to humanity its greatest healing pattern of brotherhood and fellowship. To meet violence with violence is simply to increase the confusion. But to meet violence with meekness is to introduce a principle which promises that, sooner or later, violence will be overcome. It is in this indirect way that we are healed by Christ's stripes, and that the way is prepared for the destruction of all those social institutions which involve injustice between man and man. (See intro. to Philemon, p. 1292; Brace, Gesta Christi, passim.)

CHAPTER III

1-12. Love, Peace and Brotherhood. What has been said regarding the Christian attitude toward slavery applies to the much-quoted injunction, "Wives, be in subjection to your husbands." According to the point of view of Judaism, a woman's religion was that of her husband. If he is a Jew, she is, by that fact, a Jew. The Christian gospel, as preached by Jesus and Paul, gave women their independence in religion. Paul has much to say (cf. 1 Cor. 7:14) concerning the woman who is a Christian, though her husband is not. He even goes so far as to say that if the non-Christian husband leaves her, she is not bound to follow him. There is no doubt that the Christian religion did more in the first century—and has done more in modern times—for the education and liberation of woman than any other influence. (See Brace, op. cit., chs. 3, 11, 24.) Such new-found freedom was naturally often abused among uneducated people. Peace and brotherhood and patience are the keynote and harmony of these verses. The husband should show respect and tenderness to the wife (v. 7). All should have the sympathetic attitude (v. 8), and above all things, refrain from using words and language which are not truly Christian.

13-22. Jesus was Victorious through Persecution, Suffering, and Death. The secret of high living is to enthrone Jesus as Lord in the heart (v. 15). Keep your conscience clear. Then if you suffer, it will bring you closer to God, as Jesus suffered and brought us all to God (v. 18).

Preached to the spirits in prison (vv. 19, 20). These verses have been called the most difficult in the N.T. The meaning of the text as it stands is that Jesus, in the spirit, went down into Hades and preached to the spirits imprisoned there. The reference is to the tradition based on Gen. 6:1-4, "The sons of God saw the daughters of men, that they were fair." The story of the Flood as a punishment for the wickedness of (apparently) the offspring, immediately follows. The tradition is elaborated in the Book of Enoch: The children of this unlawful union taught men evil arts and were sentenced to condemnation. They were bound and imprisoned in Sheol, or Hades. Peter then is here stating the universality of Christ's salvation, that he went even to the world of the dead and saved even those superhuman spirits condemned in the days of Noah. This agrees also with 46.

Rendel Harris and many other scholars (cf. Goodspeed's N.T.) have noted that in the Greek the first words of v. 19, "in which also" contain the letters e n o k, and they have suggested that v. 19 should be translated "Enoch (enok) went and preached." This saves the passage from the peculiar statement concerning Jesus which is not found in the N.T., outside of 1 Peter. But Peter also says (46) that the gospel was preached to the dead, and that the supernatural world is subject to Jesus (322), which would seem to bear out the first interpretation given above. In any case, the heroic challenge of the passage is clear. Jesus was persecuted, he suffered and died; but his spirit marched triumphantly on, saving and healing, until he now dwells at the right hand of God.

CHAPTER IV

1-11. Suffering Purifies the Heart. The first verse contains one of the deepest principles of the Epistle. The thought connects with that of the preceding paragraph in which Jesus is portrayed as the great example. Be loyal to Jesus; follow his example. He who suffers for the right, rather than yield to the wrong, is delivering himself from the power of sin. The principle, stated in modern terms, is that the experience of suffering for the right strengthens the character and gives spiritual power. V. 2 continues, "Such a person no longer lives in accord with the physical desires of men, but in harmony with the will of God."

3, 4. Peter gives an explanation of the fact that worldly men speak evil of you. Such men feel that you have turned away from them; they cannot understand your higher ideals; they try in every way to induce you to come back; when unsuccessful, they resort to abuse. A good illustration of this may be read in Augustine's Confessions (v, 8). He tells how a young friend of his, Alypius, having resolved to lead a virtuous life, was induced by his former boon companions to attend a gladiatorial show, at the sight of which he forgot all his good intentions, "and was delighted with that guilty fight, and intoxicated with the bloody pastime." Cf. also the experience of Bunyan's Christian, when he ran from the City of Destruction, and his former friends, Pliable and Obstinate, pursued him to bring him back (Pilgrim's Progress, opening section).

5, 6. Even those who have died will not escape the great judgment upon those who live lives of sensuality, drunkenness, and dissipation. This is the reason that the gospel was preached even to the dead. The meaning evidently is that Jesus, after his earthly ministry, descended into Hades and preached to the departed souls; hence even they must stand in the divine judgment. No one, dead or alive, can set up any other standard, or have any excuse for not living according to God, in the spirit. This is the meaning of Jesus' description of the Judgment in Mt. 25^{31f}.

7-11. The end is near. Earnest Christian souls in all ages have felt the urgency of preparation for meeting the great Judge and Maker. Peter does not claim any specific knowledge as to the time and manner of the great Coming. So spiritual are Peter's words that he might be understood as referring to the "end" of each individual life, when every man closes his earthly career. But we are probably closer to Peter's thought when we say, in the twentieth century, "the kingdom of God is at hand" (Mk. 11⁵), just as Jesus said it in the first century. The Kingdom is already among us spiritually (cf. Lk. 17²¹), but we all look forward to an outward realization of universal human brotherhood. A thousand years in God's sight is as one day (2 Pet. 3⁸). The great consummation is always just ahead of us as something toward which we are to strive eagerly (cf. Rom. 8¹⁸). No trial and no suffering are to be compared to the glory that shall be revealed. Be therefore earnest and serious. The expectation of Christ's Coming is not to make men negligent of present duties. The list of virtues which Peter enumerates is comparable to the passage in Gal. 5²² (notes) on the fruits of the spirit. Peter mentions prayer, and, above all things, love for one another. He also urges hospitality and the use of whatever talent each one has in ministering to others.

12-19. Persecution Gives You a Share in Christ's Glory. To suffer as Jesus did gives you a closer fellowship with him. At his revelation, you will rejoice to have been his comrades in suffering.

In these verses are several echoes of ideas mentioned earlier in the Epistle. Chief among them are: (1) "You should not be surprised at the coming of persecution, for, as followers of Jesus, you should expect to follow his example" (cf. 2²¹). (2) "It is better to suffer because of doing what is right, than to suffer because of doing what is wrong" (cf. 3¹⁷ Rom. 13^{3, 4}). To suffer for murder or theft is a disgrace; but to suffer for Christ leads to glory and honor.

Fiery trial (v. 12). For the character of the persecution being endured, see introduction. The use of the word "fiery" indicates how terrible the trial was. But there seems also to be a subtle allusion to the fact that fire purifies.

Trial bravely endured purifies the soul—"proves" it. Partakers of Christ's sufferings (v. 13). Cf. Paul's "fellowship of his sufferings" in Phil. 3¹⁰. It is by suffering that the world is to be saved: that is why Christ suffered. To suffer for Christ's sake is to suffer with him, to make his own sufferings more effective, and to share with him in his redeeming work.

17-19. Peter draws a contrast here between the end of the wicked and the salvation of the righteous (cf. Psa. 1, notes). If a man has any doubt as to the value of right living, he can in any case certainly see the end of the ungodly and the sinners. Let those who suffer climb to the glorious spiritual heights to commit their souls to the great Creator who will not be found unfaithful. Scarcely saved (v. 18). Perhaps an echo of Jesus' words about the "strait" gate and "narrow" way. Salvation is never something to be taken for granted. There is always the possibility of a falling away. "Sin coucheth at the door" (Gen. 47), waiting to spring upon the unwary. Hence the need to "watch and pray." See Jesus' parables of watchfulness, Mt. 24³²-25³⁰. How much greater is the danger of the careless and unconcerned!

CHAPTER V

1-11. Stand Together in Your Fight Against Evil. The author refers to himself as an elder, writing to his fellow elders. This note of fellowship is characteristic of the Epistle. See note on v. 13 below. Elder is probably not used in a very technical sense, but is to be understood in contrast to the word "younger" in v. 5 (but cf. intro. to 1 and 2 Timothy, pp. 1277-8).

Tend the flock (v. 2) recalls the scene of Jn. 21. Though the John passage was perhaps written later, either that passage or the oral version of it is probably behind the present passage. As Jesus told Peter to "tend" his sheep (Jn. 21¹⁶), so Peter enjoins the elders to "tend" the flock. Not for filthy lucre, Peter draws a contrast between the hired shepherd and one who shepherds because he loves his sheep. Jn. 10¹² pictures the hireling who in time of persecution leaves his sheep and runs away; Jn. 10¹¹ tells of the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep. Peter applies this to the shepherds of the Asia Minor flocks (cf. Acts 20 28-31). The phrase neither lording it (v. 3) also suggests Jesus' words about lordship and service (Lk. 22^{24f.}) and his own example in his washing the disciples' feet (Jn. 13^{2f.}).

Gird yourself (v. 5). It is again reminiscent of Jn. 13⁴ and 21¹⁸. Jesus girded himself with the towel at the supper. It was a symbol of humility, for to carry a towel was a servant's task. Peter too girded himself with humility after his return from his denial, and now he, in the great chain of Christian fellowship, urges upon his readers that they likewise gird themselves with humility, to serve one another.

The devil as a roaring lion (vv. 8-11). Peter's reason for advising unity and discipline is the danger from the common adversary. He shares the belief of his time in the reality of the devil and other evil spirits. (See Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, ch. 1.) The hungry lion roars as he seeks his prey. The devil is hunting for human souls, and he must be steadfastly withstood. "Our wrestling is not against flesh and blood, but against . . . the world-rulers of this darkness" (Eph. 6¹²).

12-14. Conclusion. By Silvanus. Silvanus was a "faithful" follower of Peter. It is he who writes the Epistle. (See introductory remarks on authorship.) He may be the same Silvanus (Silas) who, with Paul, wrote the letters to the Thessalonians, and whose history we know to a considerable extent from Paul's letters and from the book of Acts. She that is in Babylon (v. 13). Babylon is mentioned repeatedly in Revelation (cf. 14⁸, notes) with reference to Rome. In all probability that is the meaning here. The reference then is to the church at Rome, which sends greetings. Elect together. See note on 1¹ above. As the elders are exhorted by their fellow elder (5¹), so the elect (1¹) are here greeted by one who is a fellow elect with them. On the word "elect" see 1¹, note. The early Christian was so keenly aware of the dangers from which Christ had saved him that he could never feel otherwise than that divine grace had "sought him out." Seeing the evil man he could, with all humility, say, "But for the grace of God, there am I."

With a Christian salutation, a kiss of love, and a wish for peace, the Epistle ends. When the reader has patience to penetrate behind the veil of words, he feels the heroic spirit of its author and understands one of the secret springs of the river of Christian power and persistence which has flowed down through the centuries in ever-increasing achievement.

SECOND PETER

By PROFESSOR SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

INTRODUCTION

Purpose. Happily there have been preserved for us in the N.T. several short books which when first issued were essentially "tracts for the times." A devout Christian had sensed some crisis threatening the welfare of one or another congregation. By issuing a vigorous warning he sought to rectify the situation and avert further disaster. Following a custom of the day, he cast his message into the form of a letter. Sometimes he addressed a particular church, but often he had in mind the needs of all Christians who might be menaced by the danger in question. His epistle, he hoped, would correct the trouble. Such was the little treatise now known as 2 Peter.

Occasion. The danger that loomed on the author's horizon was a threatened lowering of Christianity's moral standards. As the new religion spread to Gentile lands it had drawn into its membership persons whose ethical ideals were quite different from those cherished by its earlier adherents. From the Jewish point of view the moral life of Greeks and Romans seemed frightfully low. As a rule, Gentile converts lacked the discipline in virtuous living that had been furnished Jews through attendance upon the services of the synagogue and study of the O.T. Paul had said some very uncomplimentary things about the character of the Corinthians prior to their conversion (1 Cor. 6⁹⁻¹¹; cf. Rom. 18-32). Even after the adoption of Christianity they were slow in making their conduct conform to the ethical requirements of the new religion. The apostle Paul was constantly confronted by the problem of teaching Gentile Christians the necessity for proper morality. A large section of almost every letter that he wrote was given over to the task of inculcating the most elementary virtues (see 1 Cor. 5, 6, 7, 10, 11). On the other hand, Paul had very emphatically asserted that no one could hope to be saved simply by performing good works. In his controversy with the Christians of Judæa over the question whether Gentiles could enter the church without submitting to circumcision, Paul had made it plain that, in his opinion, salvation was not to be secured by mere obedience to the Law. Through faith in Christ and endowment by the Holy Spirit one became a new creation in Christ Jesus (Gal. 6¹⁵

2 Cor. 5¹⁷). The Christian lived entirely under the guidance of the Spirit, which furnished authoritative direction for all conduct. Only by walking in the Spirit could one be insured against yielding to the lusts of the flesh (Gal. 5¹⁶ Rom. 8¹⁻¹⁴).

The ideal of spiritual direction in Christian living as expounded by Paul contained both a challenge and a menace. In stressing liberty from law he increased the necessity for moral stamina on the part of the individual who now must possess a keenly sensitive conscience if he would strive toward the highest attainments in moral excellence. The guidance of the Spirit would then beckon him on to new endeavors. But if he were a man whose conscience had been less well disciplined, he might then fall back upon the principle of freedom from the law as an excuse for inferior attainments. He might say that he was now free to follow his personal inclinations. Since he was under the guidance of the Spirit only, a line of conduct that his inner conscience did not condemn might not seem reprehensible even though it did vary from the standards that would have been prescribed by the law. In the second century Christianity embraced in its membership persons who were disposed thus to pervert the Pauline principle of spiritual liberty. At first these individuals were to be found scattered among different churches. They affirmed that, as persons who possessed the Spirit and who had superior knowledge of the way of salvation, they were free from the legalistic restraints that had characterized Judaism. For them salvation was an affair of mental comprehension and not a matter of morality. It is this type of Christian whose presence in the communities worries the author of 2 Peter, and he writes his tract in order to warn the churches against the activities of these liberalists whom he regards as gross falsifiers of Christian truth. (Cf. p. 1277.)

Destination. Although this document is cast in the form of a letter, it is not addressed to any particular congregation. The danger which it seeks to check is not confined to one or two churches, but is felt by the writer to be more widespread. Hence he addresses himself generally to all who have espoused the precious faith of Christendom. We cannot now determine the specific congregations that he had in mind, but he makes very clear the type of error that he would like to rectify. Any Christian group into whose hands the letter might fall would have no difficulty in discovering that his words of reprimand could be fittingly applied to its situation if there were any persons among its members representing the attitude he so fiercely condemns.

Date. The rise of libertine Christian sects came about through the adoption of Christianity by Gentiles who were less sensitive to moral purity than Jews had been. These sects had become sharply differentiated from the main body of Christendom by the year 200 A.D. The situation which the author of 2 Peter confronts seems to represent an early stage in the course of this development. In his day people of the libertine tendency were still within the church. They were present at the gatherings of the community where they slyly carried on their evil designs. But the exact date at which our author wrote is very difficult if not impossible to determine. He assumes that his readers are familiar with a collection of Pauline letters which have already come to be regarded as sacred Scripture within Christianity (31⁶). Also he seems to assume that they know of the prediction about Peter's death recorded in the last chapter of the Gospel of John (114). Likewise he refers to the incident of the Transfiguration reported in the ninth chapter of Mark (116-18). By the author's day the Christian movement seems to have crystallized into an institution which had not only an O.T. Scripture but also a N.T. canon including the letters of Paul and the four Gospels. Among other Christian writers we find no such general acquaintance with the early Christian books before the middle of the second century. And the type of false teacher whom our author seeks to suppress is, judging from other Christian references, just beginning to appear toward the close of the first century (cf. Col. 28, 18f. 1 Tim. 16-11 2 Tim. 31-8 Rev. 214). Not until a generation or more later do these trouble-makers seem to have attained the prominence given them in 2 Peter.

Author. The allusions of the author to contemporary Christian history would lead us to place the composition of the letter at about the year 150 A.D. The fact that the document itself is not mentioned by any Christian writer before the year 200, and even then is not generally recognized as having a place in the N.T. canon of Scripture, would still further confirm the probability of its relatively late origin. But the writer explicitly calls himself the apostle Peter, and if this book is a work of Peter's pen, it can hardly have been later than the seventh decade of the first century. On the other hand, the character of the document's content and its references to contemporary conditions in the churches are thought by the majority of modern interpreters to compel a much later date for the composition. The unknown author's use of the revered name of Peter is a literary device employed to give greater weight to the very important and timely message of the Epistle. This practice of pseudonymity is a familiar one both in late Jewish and early Christian religious literature. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 188a; art., Backgrounds, p. 840b; intro. to Revelation, p. 1364a.) From the point of view of that age the procedure was entirely justifiable, and of very great practical value. If the message to be delivered was regarded as worthy of the ancient spokesman whose honored name it bore, the real author had no more hesitation in speaking for the ancient worthy than a present-day preacher has in delivering from a N.T. text a message to his congregation in the name of Paul or of Jesus. Pseudonymity was a recognized and acceptable literary method in ancient times. The church in the second century knew other documents, which were often highly prized, that had been issued in the revered name of Peter. There were an Apocalypse of Peter, a Preaching of Peter, and a Gospel of Peter which apparently were of about the same date as 2 Peter. The later writers assumed that their cause was entirely worthy to be served by the use of an apostolic name. They adopted this device, not to deceive their readers but to give authority to an important message and thus to preserve a genuine and worthy type of Christianity.

Summary of Teaching. Briefly outlined, the teaching is as follows: After the usual words of formal epistolary introduction (11f.) the writer affirms the divine character of the Christian life (13f.). But even though the Christian salvation imparts to men a divine nature, the struggle for moral perfection must be strenuous and persistent (15-11). This fact gives the author his task, which is to impress upon his readers the authority of his message. Back of his words stand the revelation made by Christ and the predictions of ancient prophecy (112-21). Next, he turns upon those persons who by their misdemeanors are perverting the Christian ideals by introducing lower standards of morality (ch. 2). He warns them that the failure of Christ in instituting an early judgment is no sign that they will not ultimately be called to account (31-13). The homily is brought to a close with an admonition to remain steadfast to the true faith (314-18).

Literature: The most elaborate critical commentary is Mayor, The Epistle of Jude and the Second Epistle of Peter. For contemporary eschatological thinking, see Case, The Millennial Hope; also R. H. Charles, The Book of Enoch, and A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life, second edition, pp. 412-416.

CHAPTER I

1, 2. Salutation. Dignity is added to the apostle Peter by prefixing his original Jewish name in an ancient form of spelling, Symeon (mg.; cf. Acts 15¹⁴). Also the use of the two epithets servant and apostle serves to heighten the impressiveness of the address. Peter's attachment to Jesus Christ is thus made doubly clear. He is totally enslaved to the will of his Master. At the same time he is a fully authorized apostolic representative who speaks on behalf of the priceless possession which he and all other Christians share in common through their membership in the new religion that has been established by Christ, who is hailed as both God and Saviour. After Christianity had become distinctly a Gentile religious movement it gradually lost its former hesitation, natural enough while it was still composed mainly of Jewish members, in calling Jesus God. In the second century this terminology became fairly common (cf. Jn. 20²⁸ Tit. 2¹³). Lord and Saviour are, however, most frequently used by this author to designate the dignity of Christ (1¹¹ 2²⁰ 3², 18). "Saviour" as a title for Christ first became popular in Gentile circles. These were effective epithets to employ for the purpose of impressing upon the Gentile world in particular the dignity and power of Christianity's founder.

Righteousness and knowledge indicate two essential aspects of the new religion. It owes its origin to a course of procedure on the part of God and Christ by which forgiveness and reinstatement in the divine favor have been made possible for mankind. Also the religious life of the redeemed man is distinguished by experience of continuous growth in the comprehension and fellowship of both God and Christ. One thus has an especially intimate knowledge of things divine, and may expect to possess an ever-increasing measure of God's favor and truth.

3, 4. The Divine Nature of Christians. Those who have true knowledge of God and of Christ, in contrast with the false knowledge paraded by those whom the author opposes, have been completely endowed with the capacity to live a truly godly life. This gift has been obtained only through the kindness and efficacy of divine power itself. Not by their own virtue or right, but through the favor of heaven, have believers acquired this privilege. It insures escape from condemnation for past sins and also a genuine transformation of the human being so that he now possesses a truly divine nature. This change has made possible escape from the corrupting life of the flesh and an elevation of experience to a new and higher plane where worldly lusts no longer have power over the Christian. The idea that membership in the Christian community carried with it a divinizing of human nature is, perhaps, only an extension of the Pauline conception that the believer is a new creation, or of the Johannine idea of the new birth. But in the church of the second century this notion had become a generally accepted belief. One who had received baptism and had partaken of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist not only shared in the triumph of the Christian Saviour figuratively or spiritually, but partook also of his own divine nature.

5-11. The Necessity of Moral Endeavor. Just because the Christian possessed a divine nature it was necessary for him to engage in a strenuous struggle to maintain his purity and increase the wealth and effectiveness of his piety. He could not have been saved without exercising faith in the Saviour, but the cultivation of virtue in his own personal living was a binding obligation upon him ever afterward. He must also seek to grow in the knowledge of things divine and go on to the attainment of every true virtue. Escape from former sins was only the starting point for the Christian life. If one fell back into the evil ways of former living, forgiveness for past sins would not save one from the terrors of the Judgment Day. To effect this result one must go on to positive growth in new knowledge of things divine, day by day experiencing new visions of truth and reaching new attainments in virtuous living. At least the first status of new purity acquired on entering the church must be preserved untarnished throughout one's career. Only by this course of action could one be sure of attaining unto final salvation through admission into the kingdom of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ when he would come to judge the wicked and reward the righteous.

12-21. The Divine Authority of Christian Tradition. The writer spoke in the authority of the past. God, Jesus, and ancient prophecy were behind the words of a Christian apostle. It was the latter's duty to deliver instructions that would be serviceable for admonition and guidance in a later day. This was only another way of reminding the church at the moment of the necessity of turning back to apostolic tradition as a means of refuting the novel ideas more recently brought forward by the disturbers in the Christian gatherings. The readers were told that Christianity did not rest on those mythical fabrications that were characteristic of the various pagan religions, but depended, rather, upon well-attested historical facts of which apostles had themselves been eyewitnesses (v. 16). Here the writer assumed that his readers were familiar with the Gospel account of the Transfiguration (Mk. 9^{2f}. and parallels). But the Christian congregations have as a guide not only their N.T. Scriptures, telling the story of Jesus' life. They also hark back to the O.T., which had been taken over from the Jews. These older Scriptures were a source of light to illumine the darkness of man's ignorance, since prophecy—so it was believed—was an infallible forecasting by God of events to transpire in the future. But, of course, prophecy was subject to interpretation. On the principle that Satan can always quote Scripture to his own advantage, the false teachers themselves undoubtedly were indulging in their own expositions of prophecy that were at variance with the more usual opinions of older Christian teachers. These were private readings of prophecy, which our author declares to be illegitimate.

CHAPTER II

1-9. A Sure Judgment Awaits the Errorists. The whole of the second chapter is a vigorous arraignment of the false teachers. Speaking of prophecy, the writer sees in the false prophets of ancient times the prototype of the disturbers now active in the church. They are stealthily introducing into what should be a perfectly united body the divisive influences of their novel opinions, particularly with respect to a proper type of moral conduct. Before giving the readers a detailed account of these evil persons' activities, the author dwells on the certainty of the judgment which is to overtake them (vv. 4f.). Since he is writing in the name of Peter, who had lived before these troubles had actually arisen, the present message is cast in the form of prophecy. The apostle, it is assumed, had anticipated the events that were now transpiring. He had foreseen that pernicious sects would appear in the church, and that their teachings would be a denial of the Saviour who had died on behalf of even these evildoers. Their perverse conduct would bring disgrace upon the church, as their doings were noised abroad among outsiders. But their ultimate destruction was sure. One had only to remember how severely God had punished the angels who had sinned in ancient times. Not even these supernatural beings, much less mere men like the false teachers, could hope to disobey God with impunity. Here the reference is not only to the O.T. account of the Flood and its occasion (Gen. 6¹⁻⁷), but also to tradition about the punishment of sinning angels mentioned in later Jewish books (see comments on Jude, v. 6).

The use of the word "Tartarus" for hell (v. 4, mg.) as the place where the degraded angels were in bonds would impress Gentile readers all the more forcibly because they would recall the fate that had overtaken the Titans who had incurred the displeasure of the mighty Greek deity, Zeus. For the comfort of the faithful it is to be noted also that in punishing the wicked God is not unmindful of the rewards due the righteous. He knows how to save godly persons from temptation (v. 9). Only those who give way to their fleshly desires and who despise the admonition of the older Christian teacher are in danger of punishment. The righteous Noah and his like-minded companions had not been engulfed in the Flood, nor had the pure Lot been left to perish in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah.

10-22. The Evil Doings of the False Teachers. The principal accusation brought against these evil persons concerns their grossly immoral conduct. They allow themselves to be dominated by the lusts of the flesh. Then, also, they are defiant in their attitude. Just what dominion it is that they despise, or against what dignities they rail, is not perfectly clear (cf. Jude, vv. 9f.). Perhaps they flout the control of Christ by rejecting those ideals of Christian living which the older teachers in the church advocated, and perhaps they speak lightly of such things as happened to dignitaries like the fallen angels. Whatever may be the nature of their preposterous reviling, they assume for themselves a freedom which not even the angels ventured to claim. All of this proves their utter senselessness, and is in line with their disposition to follow the impulses of their animal nature. They are no better than beasts. They are sure to receive, as the wages of their wrongdoing, divine punishment. Their evil deeds are performed even in the open (v. 13). Within the very sanctity of the Christian gatherings they ply their nefarious trade, endeavoring to lead the righteous astray. Their lustful desires are always uppermost. Instead of walking in the way of righteousness, they, like Balaam of old, turn aside to ways of wickedness. Covetousness for gold had tempted Balaam to pervert his prophetic gift, but apparently these later offenders were coveting what the author calls unsteadfast souls (v. 14) who could be drawn away from loyalty to the regular teachers and persuaded to side with the new agitators. But what blind guides they will be found to be! They are wholly unsubstantial and worthless. They are like waterless fountains that betray the thirsty soul, or like wind-driven storm clouds that drop no moisture on the parched fields. They are destined for eternal doom. They speak great words (v. 18), promising their hearers a new liberty of action, but this freedom is only an invitation to a lustful life to which more recent converts are especially susceptible. The principle of freedom is thus being used as a means of bringing men into bondage to fleshly appetites. One who has accepted Christianity, having thereby escaped the defilements of the world, would on the advice of these teachers presently find himself in a more evil state than that from which he had originally been rescued.

CHAPTER III

1-13. Certainty of Christ's Return in Judgment. Whether or not the persons accused were actually guilty of all the charges brought against them, undoubtedly they were sharply opposed to the older views regarding an early end of the present world to be effected through the return of Christ. This expectation of a catastrophic end had held a prominent place in first-century Christianity (see 1 Thess. 4:13-5:11), but as time passed without bringing the hope to fulfillment some Christians began to abandon the idea and to live as though present society would continue indefinitely under existing conditions. With the expectation of an early Judgment abandoned, the older leaders feared an immediate slackening of moral endeavor. They believed that one who cast off the fear of judgment would plunge into unrestrained immoral activities. In fact this skepticism seemed to them motivated by a desire to pursue without restraint a line of conduct dominated by the appetites of the flesh. With this thought in mind the author now returns to the subject of the impending Judgment, which had been his theme before he entered upon his tirade against the false teachers. His description of these evildoers, given in ch. 2, had been borrowed in large part from an older and briefer pamphlet, the Epistle of Jude. Now the author resumes the earlier theme. The validity of traditional Christian teaching about an early end of the world and a sure judgment of sinners is reaffirmed. Its certainty is divinely assured. Readers are called on to remember that Christian teaching had been foreshadowed in the ancient prophets and that this wisdom had also been communicated by Christ to his apostles. In particular, the day of the Lord had been announced by the prophets, had been preached by Jesus, and had been reaffirmed by the apostles (v. 2). It was preposterous, therefore, for moderns to deny the expectation of Christ's return. When they said that all things had been going on for a hundred years or more since his death just as before, they were failing to recognize that God does not count time as do men. With him even a thousand years might be as a single day. They who imagine that the end of the world is still far off are deceiving themselves. Its dissolution is sure (vv. 8f.; cf. pp. 206-7, 846b).

In his vivid portrayal of the end our author combines eschatological imagery from both Jewish and Gentile areas of thinking. The idea of a Judgment in the last times was a distinctly Jewish concept, but Stoic teachers were proclaiming a dissolution of the world by a conflagration very similar to that used in this picture. Eschatological speculation, however, is not this author's primary interest. His chief concern is for the maintenance of high standards of Christian morality. The great lesson that he tries to drive home is the absolute necessity for holy living and the cultivation of genuine godliness on the part of all persons within the church.

14-18. Final Exhortation to Righteous Living. In view of the certainty of coming judgment readers are exhorted to live a blameless life. They should remember what Jesus had suffered for the very purpose of making salvation possible. This fact was an unmistakable indication of the divine favor for man, as had been so emphatically stressed by the famous apostle to the Gentiles in all of his letters. Mention of Paul raises a delicate problem for our author (v. 16). Doubtless his opponents were themselves using the Pauline Epistles, and especially the ideal of freedom for the spiritual man, to justify their own liberty of conduct. Admittedly, there are some things in Paul hard to understand, but certainly the false teachers have been perverting this new Christian Scripture when they used it to justify disbelief in judgment and immoral conduct. Their followers will surely meet misfortune. The only safe course is to maintain the traditional knowledge of Christ as Lord and Saviour which has been mediated through the apostolic teaching and which constitutes the generally accepted tradition of the church.

THE EPISTLES OF JOHN

BY PROFESSOR BURTON SCOTT EASTON

FIRST JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Theme of the Letter. If any man asks, "What is God like?" the answer is, "Look at Jesus Christ and see!"

This, John's universal theme, is the sole topic of our Epistle, stated and restated in every conceivable form and with all manner of applications. John would not have denied in principle that a knowledge of God might be gained by other means—in 3¹² he speaks of Abel as righteous—but his own experience had been so overwhelmed by the person of Jesus that he could not think other methods worth discussion. "No man hath beheld God at any time" (4¹² Jn. 1¹⁸); the Divine in its essence is beyond our reach unless revealed, and the only perfect revelation is in Jesus: the character of Jesus is the character of God. Two conclusions follow, which to John were simply contrasted sides of the same truth: (1) the historic fact of Jesus' life is the basis of all religion, and (2) a religion is self condemned which teaches a righteousness other than that taught by Jesus; or, in modern terms: At the supreme moment—from the birth of Jesus until his return to the Father—history and the philosophy of religion were not two but one.

The Gnostic Denial of the Theme. Toward the end of the first century, however, both these basic facts were denied by men who professed and called themselves Christians. The fashion of the day was to combine Hellenistic philosophy with Oriental religious traditions, and such a combination we term Gnosticism. The term, consequently, is vague, as it describes a method rather than a result, and covers all sorts of systems. Gnostics might be ascetic and puritanical to the last degree, or they might be debased libertines who quite literally gloried in their shame. They might be men of high mental attainments—some of the second-century Gnostics were able speculative thinkers—or they might be intellectually beneath contempt. And when Gnosticism was combined with Christianity the result might be so nearly orthodox as to cause no trouble, or it might be utterly subversive of the church's faith and life. With the milder forms N.T. writers were not greatly concerned; such were only "profane and old wives' fables" (1 Tim. 4⁷), a foolish waste of time, no doubt, but not seriously dangerous. But the more vicious types of Gnosticism could receive no quarter, and it was with those that John had to deal. (See intro. to Colossians, p. 1250.)

Tradition gives as his chief antagonist a certain Cerinthus, who taught in Ephesus around 95 A.D., and what early Christian writers tell us about this man agrees with what we can deduce from the Epistle itself. The name "Gnostic" ("one who knows") is derived from the boast, "We know God" (2⁴). Such knowledge, derived in part from ecstatic experiences (4¹), was quite different from that taught in Christian tradition, so that anti-Gnostic writers urge the novelty of the doctrine as one reason for rejecting it (2²⁴).

Almost universal among the Gnostics was a philosophical dualism, which identified spirit with good and matter with evil. This made the incarnation unthinkable, since the divine could not come into contact with matter, and thereby presented Christian Gnostics with a puzzling problem. They generally agreed that the incarnation was in appearance only (a heresy technically described as "docetism," derived from the Greek word meaning "to seem"), but Cerinthus added a peculiar theory of his own, teaching (2²²) that Jesus and Christ were different beings. On the former, a mere man, at the time of his baptism the celestial Christ descended—"he came by water" (5⁶)—and used him as a medium for his revelations; although the words were Christ's the voice was that of Jesus, so no one could really hear Christ speak, while he certainly could not be seen or touched (1¹⁻³). When Christ concluded his message, he left Jesus and the latter was crucified, an event that had no religious significance, as Christ was not involved; "he did not come by blood," according to Cerinthus (see 5⁶).

Acceptance of such tenets made a man a Gnostic, a spiritual being who could boast, "I am in the Light" (2⁹) and "I have fellowship with God" (1⁶). Being himself "beyond good and evil," he had no longer to concern himself with sin (18, 10) and his sole concern was to keep the rules in the Gnostic law (3⁴). A superman, he had no feeling of responsibility toward ordinary "psychic" men (i.e., men who had not attained to the "spiritual" or "pneumatic" stage); they were as far below him as the lower animals and he was no more bound to love them than he was to love beasts or reptiles (310, 15 48, 20). Yet it is only fair to note that John does not accuse his particular adversaries of a licentiousness which appears in other Gnostic groups (2 Pet. 214).

In John's day the more thoroughgoing Christian Gnostics had left the church (219) and had founded communities of their own, into which they were endeavoring to entice others by all sorts of arguments and promises. And even among those who remained there were those who found Gnostic tenets attractive, a class that must have included many who were only lax and thoughtless. This was the situation that John wrote to meet.

John's Reply to the Gnostics. "Jesus Christ is come in the flesh" (42) is the formula which lays the axe to the root of the tree. All that Jesus said and did is the revelation of God, not merely certain parts of his teaching and life which alone the Gnostics attributed to "Christ." And what Jesus said and did is no secret, to be learned from these new teachers, but has been preached without reserve ever since Christianity began. It can all be summed up in the single word "love": this is God, this is Jesus, this is Christianity. And so John, in replying to a teaching that bewilders modern readers with its fantastic absurdity, raises his answer to the utmost religious heights.

Against the Gnostic dualism of spirit and matter he sets the Christian dualism of good and evil; however evil may have originated—and John does not waste time in puzzling over the problem—the important fact is that it exists and must be fought. And in this war there is no compromise. Whoever hopes for God's approval thinks of sin as exceeding sinful, "purifieth himself even as he is pure" (33), and displays his purity in moral activity. "This is his commandment, that we should believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another" (323); such belief and such love are inseparable.

The Christian and the Church. Since Christianity manifests itself in love, it demands social relationships, and, therefore, it demands a special, consecrated society in which these relationships may be practiced to the full; this was as axiomatic to John as it was to the O.T. writers, who think of "God" and "Israel" as well-nigh correlative terms. We have fellowship with God because "we have fellowship one with another" (13.6, 7). And so John's doctrine of the church is the most pronounced of the whole N.T., even though he does not use the word (in 3 John it describes only the local congregation). In large part this doctrine is simply the result of his observation of facts as they were. Writing near the end of the first century, he saw the degradation of the Hellenistic world with the eyes of a pastor who had labored in it for years. And the church, which took as its charter God's demand for utter righteousness, was the sole visible alternative. So John extended his dualism to cover the practical facts of his experience; the church is on God's side while the rest of the world—or the world directly—is on the devil's. This may be called "ecclesiasticism," but it is the ecclesiasticism of a passionately earnest man face to face with overwhelming problems and unconcerned with anything except the immediate practical issue.

Hence, to all intents and purposes, church membership was to John the necessary and sufficient condition for salvation. "We are of God and the whole world lieth in the evil one" (519). To be sure, "not all are of us," (219) but the nature of these will be made clear by their departure, either of their own accord or by excommunication (44). For those who remain faithful John has only the highest and most unconditional praise: "Your sins are forgiven you" (212), "ye have overcome the evil one" (213), "ye are strong" (214), "ye know all things" (220), "ye need not that any one teach you" (227), "we have passed out of death into life" (314), "ye have eternal life" (513). No Gnostic could use more realistic language to describe the certainty of his converts' salvation.

Security still Requires Watchfulness. And without doubt the extreme assurance of the Gnostics supplied John with one motive in his use of such phrases; he wished to make his readers feel that they were already in possession of all that Gnostics might promise. Another factor was pastoral tact; John knew that more men suffer from diffidence and despondency than from presumption, that encouragement and judicious praise are more helpful than denunciation. But, besides this, he was once more speaking from experience: The band of men and women who, on the one hand, had made the very real sacrifices involved in embracing Christianity, and who, on the other hand, had resisted the Gnostic seductions, had a right to be taken seriously as moral persons. The basic reason, however, for John's confidence was his faith in God and in Jesus Christ. "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us" (410); the way to God is not a human quest with endless opportunities for error. The power comes from on high, and man, once in the right way, has only to yield himself to that power.

Not that the process is merely automatic, for throughout the Epistle there is an undercurrent of warning, various significant "if's," and a frank recognition that (grave) sin is an ever-present possibility (18-21² 51⁶). But John does not let himself dwell on these things; instead he sets before his readers an ideal sinlessness so extreme as to seem out of the reach of flesh and blood (35-9). Many commentators consequently explain his words as expressing only an ideal to remind us that the more we progress the less we shall sin. But John means precisely what he says, and thinks of sinlessness as something not only attainable but frequently attained; God's demands on us are so simple and his commandments so much the reverse of grievous (53) as to be well within our power. So, if we are making a real effort in the important matters, we can safely dismiss worry about minor imperfections, for these things, inevitable as long as we are in the body, do not cloud our relation to God. Even though a scrupulous conscience condemns us, God takes our whole nature into consideration; when we remember this we may reassure our heart (31⁹f.). This is what Paul means, in part, by justification by faith. (See notes on Rom. 321-31.) Such counsel comes from a very wise and experienced pastor, who knows the harm that anxious scrupulosity and dread may work (418).

Form and Style of the Letter. As to form, 1 John is rather a tractate than an epistle in the strict sense of the term, for the conventional opening and closing formulæ are lacking. But the traditional designation is accurate enough, for the work was evidently written for a concrete audience (44), who are addressed throughout in the second person.

More important is the question of the style. This, which is unique but the perfect expression of John's thought, is determined by his intense feeling for the unity of the Christian message; as he sees it, there is only a single revealed truth, whose various aspects are so interdependent that they blend at every point into one another. So all Christian terms are practically synonymous and any one of them may be replaced at will by almost any other. This conception produces a perfectly smooth stylistic flow, in which practically every sentence is linked with the preceding and the following, but at the same time it is fatal to logical development in the ordinary sense of the word; since everything Christian is more or less the same in essence, any of John's paragraphs may contain almost anything. And he sees no reason to avoid repetitions, for to him nothing after his first sentence can escape being a repetition in some sense. The Epistle is accordingly the despair of the formal analyst, and even the traditional paragraphs of the printed editions are little more than inherited conventions; other groupings of the verses are often urged by modern commentators.

Summary of the Letter. John opens with four verses that state his theme (11-4), and his development then seems to be controlled by the three words "fellowship," "sin," and "commandments," which appear in varying uses (15-211). A succinct, really independent paragraph (212-17) forms a resting place, with a direct appeal to the readers. Then the discussion is resumed around "Antichrist," "abiding," "begotten of God," and "love" (218-324), with no pronounced breaks anywhere. A second resting place is offered by another independent paragraph (41-6) on true and false inspiration, and then John sums up in the magnificent section 47-21, after which the futilities of Gnosticism (51-13) appear grotesque by contrast; 513 concludes the Epistle proper; 514-17 deals with a painful but necessary question, while the epilogue (518-21) provides a worthy conclusion to the whole, with its superb triple declaration and its two crisp final sentences.

Authorship. The writer of the Epistle was evidently a man of great authority; on the title "elder," which he uses in 2 and 3 John, cf. on 2 Jn. 1. And much the most natural interpretation of 1 Jn. 11-3 is to understand him as claiming membership in the authoritative band of eyewitnesses of Jesus' earthly life.

The thought and the style of the fourth Gospel and 1 John agree so closely as to make a common author more than probable (on the further questions involved see intro. to the fourth Gospel). But there are certain real differences of emphasis—e.g., the insistence on the nearness of the end in 1 Jn. 218 is lacking in the Gospel—that make it impossible to bring the two works too close together; certainly they were not meant to be mutually supplementary.

Tradition points unanimously to Ephesus as the place of writing. The date cannot be very far from the year 100 A.D.

Literature: The "classical" English commentary on John's Epistles is Westcott, The Epistles of St. John, first published in 1883. It is learned and deeply spiritual. Brooke, The Johannine Epistles, in the International Critical Commentary, is expository rather than exegetical. An excellent popular commentary is Pakenham-Walsh, The Epistles of St. John. More purely expository works: Robert Law, The Tests of Life, brilliantly written; Watson, The First Epistle General of St. John, the work of a skilled pastor; and Gore, The Epistles of St. John, written with deep spiritual insight.

CHAPTER I

1-4. The Place of Personal Experience. In a single sentence (vv. 1-3) packed with implications John sets forth not only the theme of his Epistle but the essence of his argument as well. Gnostics were usually docetics, teaching that the manifestation of Christ on earth was only in appearance, that either his form was a physical illusion or else what was visible was not Christ at all (see intro.). John contradicts such teaching at every point. Jesus Christ's voice could be heard, his form could be seen—a fact so important that John repeats it three times, varying the verb for emphasis—and human hands could handle him. Conversely, the person of whom this was true was no mere instrument of a higher power. He was that higher power, he came from the Father, he is eternal, and he is so completely the source of all life that he may be spoken of simply as "life" itself. All this is completely attested and (v. 4) the joy the Christian message brings must not be clouded by plausibly suggested doubts.

The we throughout, particularly in its contrast to you in vv. 2f., is most simply taken to mean those who were "eyewitnesses and ministers of the word" (Lk. 12), whose testimony was still active even though most of the group were dead. The fellowship of this group with God and Jesus Christ was so intense that their teaching is normative for all Christians—a common theme in anti-Gnostic writings, but the present passage is unique in its vivid sense of personal experience. In v. 1 the word of life is presumably the Gospel message, but the exact force is debated.

5-10. Sin Excludes from God. Since God by his very nature is perfect righteousness (=light), any religion that treats evil lightly is self-condemned. And so the Gnostics are self-condemned, despite their boasts, We have fellowship with him (v. 6), We have no sin (v. 8), and We have not sinned (v. 10). The last two of these sentences stir John's anger to a special degree: people who say such things show that they do not know what evil is. Sinners who acknowledge their fault can be pardoned, for their very acknowledgment proves they retain a true ideal, but nothing whatever can be done for the man who refuses to admit even the existence of his errors. Note how in v. 6 to lie is to do not the truth; to John a word is an act, and this particular act he regards as conscious and deliberate.

This passage displays John's dualism (cf.

intro.). God is light and evil is darkness—and there is no third term. Note, moreover, how in vv. 6f. have fellowship with him in the negative statement is replaced by have fellowship with one another in the positive, as if the phrases were exact synonyms: to be outside the proper Christian social relationships is to be cut off from God. Consequently, it is only within the community that sins can be cleansed. This cleansing, however, is not effected simply by a right moral attitude; although such an attitude is an indispensable prerequisite, the cleansing is God's act—and by the blood of Jesus his Son (v. 7). This last phrase, which is worded in the most anti-Gnostic terminology possible (cf. 5⁶), John treats as so familiar as to need no explanation.

CHAPTER II

1-6. Keeping His Commandment. This paragraph is chiefly an emphatic reiteration of the teaching of 15-10, now with the Gnostic phrases I know him (v. 4) and I abide in him (v. 6). But sin in a Christian is something which John is not eager to discuss; after repeating his promise of cleansing (v. 2) he drops the subject and does not touch on it again until 5¹⁶ (apart from the passing allusion in 4¹⁰). Christians should live a life above sin and should "walk in the light as he is in the light" (17); God's readiness to pardon the penitent is no excuse for relaxing effort (v. 1).

For Advocate ("Interpreter"?) cf. especially on Jn. 14¹⁶, where the Spirit is called "another Advocate" (in addition to Christ). For propitiation in v. 2 cf. on Rom. 3²⁵; neither John nor Paul, however, means all possible implications in the word to be stressed—such implications, e.g., as that God is not already gracious to men, but must be made gracious by an offering; and that the offering is accepted in place of something else. The second clause of v. 2 attacks the Gnostic dogma of a salvation offered only to a small band of illuminati, but, of course, neither John nor anyone else in the first century held a pure universalism (5¹⁹).

The word commandment is now introduced and is used six times in vv. 3-8; it is taken from the O.T., but John ignores the O.T. meaning. In his vocabulary the commandment is to walk even as he walked, to imitate Jesus, and no other commandment has any Christian importance. This is the word which is to be kept, the sole means for perfecting man's love of God (v. 5). The concluding words of v. 5, in him, belong to the language of mysticism and have, strictly speaking, almost a local force. In a pure mysticism this would lead to the thought of the final absorption of the soul in the Divinity, but Christianity, with its unvarying emphasis on the reality and dignity of human personality, avoids such a conclusion; the righteous soul is completely surrounded by God but always remains itself. The whole discussion thus far is summarized in v. 6.

7-11. The Commandment is Love. The crucial point lies in v. 9. The Gnostic, who proclaimed I am in the light, believed that he belonged to an order of beings so high as to be above obligations to ordinary, "psychic" men (see intro.). Such teaching is in utter conflict with the fundamental Christian principle of love, and this principle John now prepares to state, emphasizing its wholly basic character by prefacing it with two verses (7f.) of description. To Christians the commandment is old, for they learned it at their conversion (the beginning) and their whole experience ever since has been simply its continual application. But to the world the same commandment is new (which thing is this novelty), realized for the first time in Christ and in his church (in you). To John, evidently, all pre-Christian and non-Christian love is so inadequate by comparison as to be negligible.

Finally John comes to his own summary (v. 10): The true Gnostic—he who is truly in the light—is he that loveth his brother; such a man, thanks to the illumination of his road, never stumbles (the correct translation of v. 10b). And so (v. 11) John's adversaries, despite their boasting, are of all men the most pitiable. It may be observed that v. 10 can be used to commend the best O.T. and Gentile ethics as thoroughly as v. 8 can be used to discredit them, but John does not take such problems into consideration.

12-17. Love is Possible to All. This paragraph marks a pause in the argument and John passes to a direct appeal to his readers. In their relation to him they are all little children, with the universal Christian privileges of forgiveness (v. 12) and knowledge of the Father (v. 13). But they may be divided into fathers, the more mature who are rich in meditation and wisdom, and young men, the comparative neophytes who have still to progress in the spiritual life and are appropriately pictured as strong warriors, engaged in victorious warfare with Satan. The change from I write in vv. 12f. to I have written in vv. 13f. is formal only, I have written referring simply to the Epistle thus far, without any reference to some earlier (lost) letter or to the fourth Gospel.

The full Christian experience (vv. 12-14) includes a joyous certainty; John's readers are already in a state of salvation, they are already abundantly taught by God, and so they need no assistance from anyone—least of all from the Gnostics. And yet (vv. 15-17) no Christian has progressed so far that he can afford to be careless; the world—the aggregate of a humanity lost in sin and under the rule of the powers of evil—is very near and, despite its wickedness, may only too easily be found attractive. John sums up its allurements in a triple phrase, where the word translated life is used in the special sense of "money." So fleshly desires, tempting glitter and the parade of luxury.

V. 17, while summing up, links to the next paragraph by means of its mention of the impending dissolution.

18, 19. The Threat of Antichrist. Like all Christians of the apostolic age, John believed that the end of the world was at hand, and he was ready to find corroboration in every "sign" he thought he could identify; the same tendency has reappeared constantly throughout Christian history and is familiar even to-day. Now, Jewish apocalyptic commonly taught that just before the end the growing evil in the world would find its supreme embodiment in a single diabolic being, in all regards the antithesis of the Messiah. (See art., Backgrounds, p. 846b.) Hence the name Antichrist, although this title is not found in works earlier than 1 John. As to details, however, there was little agreement among apocalyptists and each drew freely on his own fancy; 2 Thess. 2³⁻¹² is a fairly typical prediction but there were many other forms; and this vagueness left John free to make his own identification, which is stated in the present passage; as to him nothing could be worse than this perverse wickedness appearing from within the church, the Gnostics seemed to be the most poignant fulfillment conceivable of the expectation. To be sure, they were only human beings, but—as John took for granted—they were so suffused with the diabolic spirit (vv. 21, 22) that each of them individually was an antichrist.

John could not give us a better picture of his horror at this evil that raised its head in the community supposedly dedicated to perfect righteousness. It was with relief that he saw the Gnostics depart (v. 19); at least they proved that not all are of us, that not all who claim to be Christians are so in reality. And no one trained in the historical interpretation of the N.T. will be troubled at John's identification of the impending crisis with apocalyptic expectations; to blame John for thinking in such terms would be to blame him because he lived in the first century. But attempts to use John's language in support of modern apocalypics are discredited in advance; the purpose of religion is not to minister to curiosity.

20-25. An Anointing from the Anointed One.

Returning to the specific Gnostic errors, John emphasizes once more the maturity and understanding of his readers but now introduces a new word, anointing, which is to reappear in v. 27. It is a play (in Greek) on Christ; he, "the Anointed One," has given his own character to his disciples, so that they all know (mg.). They know the truth—no simple one!—contained in vv. 18f. But they know also the more vital truth of v. 22. To claim that Jesus and Christ are not one but two is to deny the completeness and the reality of the revelation of God in Jesus, and this last conclusion is the sum of all possible religious errors. To deny the Son is to deny the Father; criticism of Jesus manifests ignorance of the nature of God. So important is this theme to John—it is one of the most common in his Gospel—that he repeats it in v. 23 in strict formal parallelism in order to give it all possible emphasis. That this truth should be denied by so-called Christians is monstrous, for the Gnostic teaching contradicts the universal apostolic preaching (v. 24; cf. 1st 27); the faithful, who are certain of the validity of their religious experience and of its final realization in the life eternal (v. 25), have not so learned Christ.

In v. 20 the Holy One is Christ, not the Father; cf. Acts 2nd 33, etc.

26-29. The Discovery of New Truth. These verses summarize and reiterate vv. 18-25, much as vv. 1-6 reiterate 15-10; such cumulative repetition is characteristic of John's style. While v. 21 has affirmed that the readers are already in possession of all fundamental truth, v. 27 promises that the same anointing will enable them to solve each new problem as it arises. By this teaching (cf. Jn. 14th 26 1612f.) John takes a line of his own in the Gnostic controversy. In opposition to the novelty of the Gnostic doctrines, "orthodox" writers were inclined to deprecate questionings of any sort on the part of Christians and to set up an ideal of rigid adherence to the received tradition, without seeking to inquire further (e.g., Jude v. 3). But John holds that the answer to Gnostic inquiries is to be found in more far-reaching inquiries; if these are conducted in the proper spirit, they will be rewarded by the discovery of fresh truth. To be noted throughout this paragraph is the insistence on the doctrine of Christian religious democracy; John himself has the right to teach other Christians only as a fellow expounder of the truth which in essence they all share.

The slight variant possibilities (indicated in the mg.) of the translation of vv. 27-29 do not affect the general sense.

In v. 29, which returns to the moral emphasis of the earlier sections, John prepares also for ch. 3 by introducing the phrase begotten of God, around which the next paragraph is to turn. This phrase reappears in 4th 7, 51, 4, 18; and is consequently characteristic of the Epistle. In the O.T. it is found only in Psa. 27, and elsewhere in the N.T. only (in all essentials) in Jn. 1st 13 and 33-9. It is derived partly from the fundamental Christian conception of God's Fatherhood, partly from transferring a characteristic of Christ to his followers (51), and partly, no doubt, from the language of the Hellenistic religions. In them it is extremely common and it is presumably a favorite Gnostic phrase, which John turns against its users.

CHAPTER III

1-12. Perfect Life Through Perfect Love.

John resumes his development of the moral argument, now, in so triumphant a tone that he dispenses with exhortation and takes Christian salvation completely for granted. How can we fail? We are God's children, not only in name but in fact, with a character so supernatural that the world cannot understand it (v. 1). Already we are God's children, even in our present imperfect state, and are destined to be transformed wholly into his likeness (v. 2). John's proof (v. 2b) of this last promise uses a mystical argument; we know that we shall see God (Mt. 5th 8 may be specifically in mind), and this proves that we shall be transformed into complete likeness to the Divine, since inferior beings cannot gaze at God. But again (cf. on 2nd 5) John's mysticism always preserves human identity.

No one with the glorious hope of vv. 1f. can fail to prepare himself in advance to the utmost of his ability (v. 3). Not (v. 4), of course, with the artificial purifications of the Gnostics, who laid all stress on obeying the laws of their eccentric codes and paid no attention to sin. On the contrary, sin is lawlessness—the only lawlessness that matters—and Christ (v. 5) is the antithesis of sin in all its forms, not only atoning for it but taking it away. And so (v. 6) whoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither knoweth him. By sin here John means primarily the deliberate choice and defense of sin, but he also means more than this; he is setting before his readers an ideal of sinlessness which he is convinced lies wholly within their power (cf. intro.).

Consequently (v. 7), the Gnostics are to be ignored, for words without deeds are nothing. The dualism that exists in our universe (v. 8) is moral, with the hosts of God arrayed against the hosts of the devil—and in this warfare neutrality is impossible. John's language grows more and more unqualified until it becomes almost physical (v. 9); God's seed—probably the Spirit—so transforms a man that he cannot sin. Once more John is talking about actualities, not about an impossible ideal. Such men and women exist and in sufficient numbers to be a real factor in the universe.

In v. 10 we have an amplification of Mt. 7²⁰, with a concrete application at the end which looks back to 2¹⁰ and also links forward to the next section. At the same time it suggests Gen. 4³⁻⁵ as an obvious illustration; here only in the Epistle does John commend a non-Christian (v. 12).

13-24. Love Within the Brotherhood. The principles of vv. 1-12 are summarized for the supreme test, "Does love prove itself in action?" Now, while Christian love is universal and unrestricted, its existence in practice must be demonstrated concretely within the circle to which the individual belongs. And for first-century Christians this circle was primarily the church—"the" brethren—whose claims were imperative. This fact, coupled with the extreme sense of personal consecration and an equally extreme dread of the corruption and idolatry of the "world," made Christians a race apart from other men. And these other men not unnaturally resented the Christians' attitude, so that all sorts of stories were in circulation, accusing them of the vilest practices. Such hatred, replies John, comes from the fact that we belong to a different world, which such men cannot understand (vv. 13f.; cf. v. 1b.); we have passed out of death into life (cf. on Jn. 5²⁴). That the transformation has really taken place is demonstrated by the presence of love—note that this love is the effect, not the cause, of salvation—for love and life are the same thing and both are from Christ (v. 16; cf. Mk. 10⁴⁵, etc., and the abundant parallels in John's Gospel).

The existence of such love (vv. 17f.) is seen in the common incidents of everyday life (cf. Mt. 5⁴²) and (v. 19) its presence should free men from all despondency or scrupulosity. Spiritual depression is, no doubt, a common occurrence (v. 20), but it is needless, for God is actually more merciful than a spiritual man's own conscience, because God takes everything into consideration. The proper attitude, therefore, is a joyous confidence (v. 21), trusting so deeply in God as never to question his full response to every need of ours. For John's doctrine of prayer see more fully on Jn. 14¹³, etc., his underlying thought being that, if we are in the right relation with God, our requests will be such as can always be granted.

In vv. 22-24a John sums up in familiar terms; it is interesting to compare v. 23 with Mt. 22³⁶⁻⁴⁰ and to observe how axiomatic it was in Christian experience to replace "love the Lord thy God" with believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ. V. 24b connects with the next section.

In the above paragraph there is a constant anti-Gnostic warning, for spiritual depression frequently leads men to change their faith, in the hope that the new system will prove more potent. And the Gnostics, with their boasts of knowledge and sinlessness, knew how to take advantage of such moments.

CHAPTER IV

1-6. A True Test for Prophetic Utterance. Here is a second resting place (cf. 2¹²⁻¹⁷), which deals with an important practical problem. In the apostolic church all were convinced that prophecy was revived and that men spoke through the inspiration of the Spirit to declare hidden truths. But Christians soon realized that ecstatic utterances are not always edifying, an experience that led them to interpret some "inspiration" as the work of evil spirits; cf. especially 1 Cor. 12, 14, and with the present passage cf. particularly 1 Cor. 12¹⁻³. Both Paul and John declare that the content of a prophecy is the test of its inspiration, and both apostles give a summary formula for practical use. In Paul (1 Cor. 12³) this is the primitive Christian watchword, "Jesus is Lord," in John (v. 2) it is slightly elaborated, Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, in order to meet the more complicated denials of the Gnostics; this is the beginning of a process that was to issue in the creeds of later Christianity.

V. 4 indicates that excommunications had taken place. On the serene confidence of v. 6 cf. intro.

6-21. Love Central and Supreme. After the short digression in vv. 1-6 John returns to 3²³ for his theme, love, which he uses (noun and verb) no less than twenty-five times in the present fifteen verses, besides two instances of beloved. With such a theme the primary appeal is emotional and so John, with consummate literary tact, avoids raising new questions and writes in language that no one can fail to understand; the result is a passage whose beauty is rivaled only in 1 Cor. 13. God is love—has made his love known to man through his Son—awakening man's echoing response—demonstrated in visible acts of service to others. In these acts religion culminates, and if such acts do not appear, the whole structure is futile. God has set our brother where we can see him in order to give our love an object; if we neglect this object which stands before us, there is no profit in proclaiming our affection for an invisible God (v. 20), for without love of man love of God cannot exist. Here John, himself a mystic, parts company from the "pure" mystics; they find man's highest destiny on earth in contemplation; John finds it in practical activity.

For v. 12 cf. on Jn. 11⁸ and note how it prepares for v. 20.

John's insistence that love must come from God before it can be practiced by men (vv. 10, 19) has no anti-Gnostic point, but is to him a mere statement of a religious axiom; the Shepherd seeks the sheep, not the sheep the Shepherd. On v. 12a cf. intro.; beheld in this clause is balanced by the same verb in v. 14 (cf. Jn. 11⁸) and the saying helps prepare for v. 20. V. 14 (cf. 11-3) is the perfect summary of the apostolic message; here world does not have the usual evil sense. With v. 17b cf. 31⁴, but now the self-consciousness is even more extreme; apparently, although in this world, we, by sharing the divine life, are far above it, even as Christ is. And in v. 18—a verse comparable only to Jn. 15^{14, 15}—this self-consciousness reaches its supremest exaltation.

CHAPTER V

1-13. The Spirit and the Victorious Life.

As the last paragraph expounds the Christian ideal as it is in itself, so the present section expounds it in contrast to Gnosticism. But John avoids any sharp transition; vv. 1-4 summarize once more, although in so doing the intellectual element is brought to the front in v. 1 and is repeated at the end of v. 4 in faith. This all-important Christian noun occurs nowhere else in John's Gospel or Epistles, apparently because John's experience was so vivid as to carry his convictions into the realm of certainty; even in the present instance his emphasis is on faith's true correspondence to its object rather than on its trustful quality. (The same is true about his frequent use of the verb believe.) On v. 3b cf. intro., p. 1352a.

Vv. 5-13 open with a restatement of a basic Johannine doctrine; cf. 22², 42¹, 15, 51. On v. 6 cf. intro. The verse is directed specifically against Cerinthus, who taught that "Christ" descended on Jesus at his baptism but left him before his Passion, thereby emptying the death of Jesus of all religious meaning and making, e.g., the appeal in 3¹⁶ a sheer absurdity. So much is clear enough, but John's development in vv. 7, 8 shows that he had in mind a further meaning, which we cannot reconstruct with certainty. The Voice from heaven at Jesus' baptism (Mk. 11¹) and the miracle at the crucifixion (Jn. 19^{34f.}; even if the Gospel were published after 1 John, this tradition must have been familiar in Johannine circles) are often invoked to explain the passage. And they may really be relevant—the Spirit (v. 8) explaining their inner significance—but, even if this is true, the exact force is obscure to us. Quite possible also is a sacramental reference to Christian experience in baptism (Jn. 35) and the Lord's Supper (Jn. 65⁸, 63), or this explanation may be combined with the preceding. But John's choice of mysterious terms is evidently deliberate; he knew that his (initiated) readers would understand his allusions, but his meaning was too deeply mystical to be stated baldly.

At any rate, John's invocation of the witness of the Spirit is—at least in part—an appeal to the witness of religious experience. The witness of men (v. 9) unquestionably helps toward belief (11-3), but belief itself rests on something deeper and more enduring. And also (v. 10a) on something more personal and inward, for he that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in him, even though (v. 10b) assent may be refused.

And finally (vv. 11-13) John sums up his whole Epistle around the word life, balancing his use of the same word in his opening verses (11-3). The paragraph division in the English versions is unfortunate, for v. 13 is the solemn conclusion (cf. Jn. 20³¹) and all that follows is epilogue (cf. Jn. 21).

8. The Threefold Witness. This mention of the threefold witness suggested to Christian students of a later day the Three Persons of the Trinity. And so, some time in the fourth century or toward the end of the third, a Spanish Christian (probably), who wrote in Latin, formed a corresponding sentence: "There are three who bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Word and the Holy Spirit, and these three are one." Perhaps he wrote this on the margin of his copy of 1 John and some later copyist thought it part of the text, but in any case these words were quoted as part of the Latin Bible in Spain at least as early as 380 A.D., on earth being added to v. 8 to balance the insertion. This "gloss" (as such insertions are called) spread, and finally became so universal in Latin-speaking Christianity that it was even translated into Greek and was added to a few late Greek MSS. (see p. 861a). From these it found its way into printed editions, and so into the first English versions. But R.V. and A.S.V. rightly omit all mention of it, as it has no claim to be considered John's words.

14-17. Forgivable and Unforgivable Sin. It would almost seem that John, on rereading what he had written, was a little disturbed by his uncompromising teaching of the necessity of sinlessness, and so he qualifies by returning to 17-22, reintroducing his theme there with two verses (14f.) on his doctrine of prayer. These repeat something of 32^{1f.}, although now with the explicit addition of according to his will. But in what follows (vv. 16f.) this addition is less a restriction than a reassurance, for nothing can be more according to God's will than the restoration of a sinner who can be brought to repentance. (Whether or not God is read in v. 16a does not affect the sense.) Yet, unfortunately, as John knows only too well, some men have let themselves go beyond the possibility of repentance (v. 16b). Tragically though the truth may be, there is a sin unto death; evil may be followed so persistently that the moral sense is at last destroyed. Specifically in John's mind—although his language and the fact described are quite general—are the Gnostics, men who by denying the reality of sin have made repentance a meaningless term. It is hardly worth while even to pray for such, since the chances of a good result are next to hopeless; such prayer is, of course, not forbidden, but there are better objects for the exercise of spiritual energy. And (v. 17) the existence of such a class is a warning against taking sin lightly, for all unrighteousness is sin. And yet no one need despair, for there is a sin not unto death; if repentance can be awakened, then there is life in the soul.

This passage corresponds to the teaching in the Synoptic Gospels concerning blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Lk. 12¹⁰ is the most primitive form), the sense being the same in both places. Unfortunately, these sayings have been made the basis of heartless deductions that have caused untold mental distress, and the natural result has been a violent reaction in modern times against any such doctrines. But when all allowance has been made, the truth remains that men can lose the power of distinguishing between right and wrong, whether by persistent gross sin or (more fatally) by refined and vicious self-deception. We may decline to speculate about the final spiritual result of such a condition, but its existence cannot be denied.

Morbid souls, however, who may torment themselves over the possibility of such sin, should be instructed that their very anxiety proves their innocence of it.

18-21. The Threefold "We Know." The addition of vv. 14-17 necessitates a new conclusion, which John frames in conscious contrast to the Gnostics' formulae, with their favorite we know three times repeated in a Christian sense; the result is intensely impressive. V. 18 qualifies vv. 16f.; even though sin can be forgiven, it should be transcended (cf. 21). In the second half of this verse the text (not the mg.) of R.V. should be followed (A.S.V. reverses), for the change from whosoever is begotten (the Christian) to he that was begotten (Christ) is in John's most perfect manner. The meaning then is that Christ, the once-begotten, "keeps" all those who through him are likewise born of God. V. 19 could be—and perhaps was—used unchanged by the Gnostics. And in v. 20 there is only one word that they would certainly have avoided, but that one word—Jesus—changes the whole sense.

The Epistle ends with an affirmation and an exhortation, both of which grow naturally out of what has been written. The affirmation: This is the true God, and eternal life. The exhortation: My little children, guard yourselves from idols—from everything, physical or mental, that distorts or falsifies God.

SECOND JOHN

INTRODUCTION

Relation to First John. This little Epistle may be described as a miniature edition of 1 John, for almost every phrase in it occurs in the larger work as well. See therefore the introduction to 1 John. It is, however, a true epistle in strict form, with the conventional opening and closing formulas.

To Whom Written. The lady of v. 1 is naturally not an individual but a church, as is seen from the plurals in vv. 6, 8, 10, 12, as well as by the general tenor of the whole. Certain children of this lady—i.e., certain members of the congregation—have recently visited John and have pleased him deeply by the sincerity of their faith (v. 4), and he perhaps sent this little greeting in their care as they returned home; he explains (v. 12) that a longer letter would not have been worth while, as he expects to visit them soon. The close connection with 1 John shows that the two Epistles are certainly by the same author, and that they must belong to approximately the same period. But there is no way of determining their relative priority.

THE EPISTLE

1-3. The Christian Truth. John describes himself simply as The elder, a term that has occasioned much discussion, as, according to traditional theories of the authorship, The apostle might be expected. Without entering into this question (cf. the intro. to John's Gospel), 1 Pet. 5¹ may perhaps be compared, while it may be observed that Papias, a writer of the next generation, calls all the apostles simply "elders." For the title cf. further on Acts 11³⁰, etc., and on 1 Tim. 5¹⁷ Tit. 15.

Why John does not name himself we do not know, nor do we know why he addresses the church as lady, but the double anonymity gives a graceful turn to the Epistle that would be lacking if it opened with (say) "John to the church of Smyrna." Elect does not occur in 1 John and here does not convey more than the fact of God's choice, without further implications.

The first four verses are dominated by the word truth, which varies its force characteristically, in truth in vv. 1 and 3 meaning only "truly," while otherwise the noun describes the Christian message. In v. 3 John rather curiously includes himself with his readers in the benediction. And the unique phrase, Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, points John's emphasis on the identity of Christ's gifts with the Father's.

4-11. The Sign of a False Teacher. John must have met these certain children while they were away from home, as otherwise only a small part of their congregation would have held the true faith. With v. 5 cf. 1 Jn. 27 3¹¹, etc. V. 6 reverses 1 Jn. 3²³ in typical Johannine fashion. With v. 7 cf. 1 Jn. 4², 3, although here "is come" is replaced by cometh, perhaps to indicate timelessness. The warning in v. 8 is a little sharper than anything in 1 John, possibly because of local conditions; for we (not ye) in this verse cf. 1 Jn. 11-3. In v. 9 goeth onward carries with it the implication in the (supposed) pursuit of knowledge, and the reference to "having" God refers no doubt to a Gnostic boast; with the verse as a whole cf. 1 Jn. 22^{3f}.

V. 10 describes itinerant preachers, familiar figures of the post-apostolic age. Many of them, of course, were devoted missionaries (3 Jn. v. 7), but this, unfortunately, could be so little taken for granted that Christians were warned (cf. p. 1264a) to examine them carefully before extending official hospitality. The house is, of course, the congregation, and the greeting formal acceptance in the community; the principle involved here makes irrelevant the contrary teaching in Mt. 5⁴⁷.

12, 13. Cf. 3 Jn. vv. 13, 14a; this must have been a favorite salutation of the elder's, and its style corresponds to that of the introductory greeting. John was not yet too old to travel. The sister is naturally the church from which he was writing.

THIRD JOHN

INTRODUCTION

1 and 2 John have to do with doctrinal disputes, but of these there is no trace in 3 John, which rebukes the insubordination of a church leader, Diotrephes (v. 9), not his theology. And the situation is clear, when set in a wider historical environment.

The Changing Ecclesiastical Situation. From 1 Timothy we learn that when the Pastoral Epistles were written, the churches in the neighborhood of Ephesus were organized—or were being organized—according to the plan of Acts 11³⁰; i.e., under the control of a council of elders, who were responsible as a body. But around the year 110 A.D. the letters of Ignatius of Antioch prove that in the same locality a different system was now accepted; the elders were no longer rulers of the church, but had become simply the advisers of a single individual, the bishop, whose powers are justly described as "monarchical." Consequently, as Ignatius wrote only a decade or so after John, the new system must have been emerging in the latter's day. Now, in 3 Jn. vv. 9f. a certain Diotrephes is described as possessing certain powers: He has the pre-eminence, he controls the church's correspondence, he receives or rejects Christians from other localities, and he can excommunicate. But these powers, taken together, are precisely those of a "bishop" in the Ignatian sense.

Diotrephes, then, was such a bishop, who claimed exclusive jurisdiction over the church in his own city, and he was supported in his claim by a majority of his congregation. On the other hand, John had exercised a traditional authority over the entire district, so that a clash had resulted.

One source of the difficulty, no doubt, was the somewhat vague nature of John's power, as his exact rank in the Christendom of western Asia Minor could not have been closely defined. He was not the founder of the churches there—this had been Paul's work—and even apostolic authority hardly extended to another man's foundation (Rom. 15²⁰). A congregation, consequently, might think itself justified in refusing to obey his orders, especially since aged saints, despite all their wisdom and holiness, are not infrequently "difficult."

One thing at least is clear; the new method of organization—or something like it—was inevitable. The churches were growing enormously and their problems were growing with them, particularly in view of the Gnostic dangers. And the unwieldy boards of elders were not adapted to cope with the situation; the time had come for single executives with undivided responsibility. This "polity," which originated in Jerusalem (Acts 21¹⁸), had by the time of 3 John spread well throughout Palestine and to the north at least as far as Antioch, so that its adoption in Asia Minor was easy and natural. [This is a correct account of the origin of the "episcopacy," but it also shows that the episcopacy was not so much something inherent in the very nature of Christianity as it was a natural development of the life of the church in the circumstances in which it found itself. See further the intro. to 1 and 2 Timothy, pp. 1277-8.]

John's Fear of the New Polity. Our little Epistle shows, however, that, even apart from the personal difficulties with Diotrephes, there was no enthusiasm for the plan on John's part. He does not seem to have fought it determinedly, for Polycarp, who knew John personally and idolized him, accepted the bishopric of Smyrna. None the less, there is contempt in John's who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them (v. 9), and other Christians certainly shared his reluctance to accept the novel organization. Even by Ignatius' day objections in Asia Minor had not died down, while churches in other parts of the Empire adhered tenaciously to the older system. But episcopacy proved efficient, so efficient that by the year 300 A.D. other forms of church government were all but forgotten, with the result that Diotrephes, had he lived, might have claimed the victory.

And yet the conduct of which John complains in v. 10 was inexcusable; however good a case Diotrephes may have had at the start—and we do not know the precise difficulty—he managed to put himself permanently in the wrong by his unfeeling behavior. 3 John is consequently an intensely human document, illustrating the difficulties caused by the age-old problem of efficient organization in conflict with personality, while the Epistle incidentally gives us an important side-light on a very obscure period.

A Personal Letter. In form 3 John is a highly confidential note from a leader to his lieutenant, the very reverse of an "epistle" meant for public reading. Its preservation must have been accidental, and it was made part of the N.T. at a relatively late date, when anything by John was felt to be inherently sacred. (See art., Formation of N.T., p. 857b.)

THE EPISTLE

1. Salutation. The greeting is brief, as befits a private and informal note. Gaius occurs also in Acts 19²⁹ 20⁴ Rom. 16²³ 1 Cor. 11⁴, but the name was extremely common and no identification is possible. This particular Gaius seems to have been the minority leader (v. 14) in "the" church of v. 9; in any event he was well known in the district and was probably one of John's converts (v. 4).

2-8. Kindness to Strangers. Some missionaries (cf. 2 Jn. v. 10) had been entertained by Gaius (v. 5), perhaps after Diotrephes had refused to receive them (v. 9). When they made their public report after reaching home (v. 6), they praised Gaius' hospitality in the highest terms—to the special joy of John, who (v. 3) had been in doubt about his disciple's loyalty. His satisfaction is voiced in the charming turn he gives to the conventional wish (v. 2) for Gaius' good health: "May your physical well-being correspond to your spiritual achievements!" (Much in need of fresh emphasis to-day is the underlying thought that the soul-life is the true measure of prosperity.)

Now, the same missionaries were to return, carrying the present letter to Gaius, who is asked (v. 6) to care for them once more. No doubt such repeated visits were burdensome (v. 8), but the duty of Christians was clear, all the more because scruples existed about receiving hospitality from even friendly non-Christians (v. 7). Paul's example (1 Cor. 9¹⁸, etc.) may be responsible for this last custom; contrast Lk. 10⁸.

9-12. The Evil of Christian Division. (Cf. intro.) It is interesting to note that John, like Paul (2 Cor. 13¹⁻⁴), was convinced that his personal presence would bear down all opposition. The letter mentioned in v. 9 is lost, for it cannot be 1 or 2 John. Gaius would, of course, be familiar with the events described in vv. 9f., but John wished to make his own position plain. V. 11, with an inimitably Johannine turn of thought and language, takes up v. 6; John was afraid that Gaius might resent this new burden. About Demetrius we know nothing.

13, 14. Cf. on 2 Jn. v. 12. The friends in the final clause were the local members of John's party.

JUDE

By PROFESSOR SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

INTRODUCTION

Occasion. Like 2 Peter, Jude was called forth by the presence of certain persons in the church who were thought to be perverting the purity of Christianity. They were teaching a liberty of conduct that seemed a menace to Christian virtue. It had been the author's intention to write a treatise on the general character of the Christian salvation (v. 3), but on learning of the danger that threatened certain congregations who were being led into improper ways of conduct by false teachers he hastily composed this brief tract urging his readers to strive with all their might to preserve the traditional ideals that had been set up by a previous generation of Christian leaders. The occasion was essentially the same as that which had prompted the writing of 2 Peter (see pp. 1345-6.)

Date. The close parallelism between Jude as a whole and the second chapter of 2 Peter in particular is apparent at a glance when the two documents are placed side by side. It is now generally agreed among scholars that the shorter letter of Jude was the older and was largely reproduced by the author of 2 Peter. The former is more spontaneous, is less studied in its style, and shows other evidences of priority. It is easier to understand why a writer should elaborate a briefer treatise than to suppose that a longer work such as 2 Peter should have been abbreviated. But even assuming the priority of Jude, its exact date of composition is still very doubtful. The type of trouble which it seeks to correct was already beginning to show itself in Christianity toward the close of the first century. In some of the later N.T. books there are vague references to these troubles (cf. Col. 28, 18; 1 Tim. 61-11 2 Tim. 31-8 Rev. 214). But apart from Jude and 2 Peter, the danger is not thought to be so serious as to call for a special treatise on the subject. Probably this critical stage was not reached before the early part of the second century.

Destination and Author. The location of the communities addressed is as uncertain as is the case with 2 Peter. But the more informal style of Jude readily leads one to believe that the author had more definitely in mind specific congregations than did the writer of 2 Peter. Nor is it so clear that Jude is pseudonymous.

The name "Jude" (literally, "Judas"), though no doubt common enough, was not particularly distinguished, and it is difficult to imagine that a writer who wanted to claim for his message the authority of some famous personage of the past would have chosen one that was so inconspicuous. Other N.T. books mention a Judas who had been one of Joseph's ancestors (Lk. 330), a Judas among the brothers of Jesus (Mt. 1355 Mk. 63), a Judas Iscariot (e.g., Mk. 319 1410, 43 Acts 116, 25), a Judas who was son of James and one of the apostolic company (Lk. 616 Acts 113), a Judas of Galilee (Acts 537), a Judas with whom Saul lodged in Damascus (Acts 911), and a Judas surnamed Barsabbas who was a companion of Paul (Acts 1522-34). The name was very common among Jews, and that some Christian Judas should have written this timely tract to groups of believers with whom he was in close touch is not at all improbable. Yet it would have been quite unlikely that in the first quarter of the second century a brother of Jesus, or even a companion of Paul, would have been still alive. But perhaps when later Christendom was in process of forming its canon of N.T. Scripture this little document was felt to be so useful for resisting the libertine sects of the later times that the document was further accredited by making its author a "brother of James," now famous as a leader in the ancient church.

Summary of the Teaching of the Epistle. It is the author's message, and not his name, to which he would attract attention. After a very brief form of greeting he passes immediately to his central theme. He writes to place Christians on their guard against the activities of certain despicable persons who are slyly undermining the godly character of the Christian community (vv. 3f.). First he emphasizes the certainty of the divine judgment (vv. 5-11), and then follows a vivid characterization of the wickedness of the trouble-makers (vv. 12-18). The true Christians are to fall back upon the authority of the apostles and to continue steadfast in perpetuating the original customs of the new religion (vv. 19-23). A characteristic exhortation ends this brief communication (vv. 24f.).

Literature: Same as for 2 Peter; also Ferrar, The Assumption of Moses.

THE EPISTLE

1, 2. Salutation. Christian teachers sometimes called themselves the servants of Christ (Rom. 1¹ Phil. 1¹ Jas. 1¹ 2 Pet. 1¹). They wished it understood that they spoke on behalf of their master and not primarily for themselves. Also they employed language that would remind the readers of the high status of privilege enjoyed by every Christian. The church is the object of God's love and is preserved for Christ, probably meaning particularly for his future coming when he would institute judgment and establish his kingdom. An increase of mercy, peace, and divine love may fitly be wished for the faithful.

3, 4. Danger to the Faith. Christians as privileged people, who share in common the hope of salvation that has been insured to them through the work of Christ, was a theme upon which the author had been meditating and planning the production of a composition. But suddenly he had been impelled to write a less finished treatise in a more strenuous vein. He had learned that the pure Christian heritage was in danger of perversion. He is not thinking so much of a perversion of dogma or creed as he is of an erroneous type of conduct. Certain base persons have insinuated themselves into the respect of the congregations and their presence is a serious menace to the standards of Christian morality. These individuals refuse to follow the content of religious teaching as it has been passed on from Jesus Christ by successive generations of Christian leaders. This is the threatening danger against which the author raises his voice of protest. Christians are to contend strenuously for the maintenance of their purity.

5-11. Certainty of Judgment. Before describing more particularly the character of the evildoers, the author dwells on the certainty of judgment awaiting all those who deviate from the right path. Examples from history are cited to prove that divine punishment will surely overtake sinners, even though they belong to the chosen people of God once so highly favored as to have been conducted out of bondage in Egypt (cf. Num. 14²⁹, 37 26^{64f.}). But the writer does not restrict himself to the O.T. for examples of God's dealings with the Jews. His readers are supposed to know the story of the rebellious angels as described in certain Jewish apocryphal writings, particularly the Book of Enoch. (See art., Intertestamental Religion, pp. 204-5; cf. also pp. 197-8.) There a vivid picture was painted of the manner in which the sinning angels had been ejected from heaven and cast down to the abyss, where they were enchained until the Day of Judgment

(see Enoch, chs. 5-16, 21f., 54, 64, 67f.). If even angels had been unable to escape the displeasure of God, how much less likely would these men who were sinning against God in the church be able to avoid punishment. The fate that overcame Sodom and Gomorrah because of the people's sin is a further reminder of God's vengeance (Gen. 19²⁴). The sinners in the church are not unlike the wicked people of the ancient cities in their vice. In their very dreams they defile themselves with their evil minds, and in their waking moments they brazenly throw off the restraint which Christ would impose upon them. They despise the instruction of the older Christian teachers, even as they ignore the lessons to be learned from the fate of such dignified beings as angels. Again the author turns to an apocryphal Jewish book, the Assumption of Moses, for a further illustration of proper respect for authority, a trait so conspicuously absent from the false teachers. (See art., Intertestamental Literature, p. 198b; cf. p. 1277b.) Even the archangel, Michael, when disputing with Satan for possession of the body of Moses, did not presume to usurp the authority of God by pronouncing judgment on the devil, but left the rebuke to be given by the Lord himself (v. 9). On the other hand, the present offenders lift up their voice against all authority. They show themselves to be senseless animals utterly devoid of reason. By their conduct they are bringing down upon their own heads ultimate destruction. Cain and Balaam and Korah are other prototypes from whose punishments faithful Christians may deduce the certainty of judgment that threatens these more recent sinners. Cain's crime had been murder (Gen. 4), but probably it is his godlessness in general that constitutes his likeness to the wicked persons in the church. They are also guilty of the desire for gain that characterized Balaam (Num. 22-24), while in their rebellious attitude toward Christian leaders they are guilty of Korah's sin of disobedience (Num. 16). But the same sad fate awaits them that overtook their predecessors in sin.

12-18. Character of the Evildoers. Having emphasized the certainty of judgment, the author now undertakes to describe more particularly the character of their offenses. They set themselves up for leaders of the Christian communities and are to be found at the common meal of the society where, however, they feed themselves rather than the needy flock (see 1 Cor. 11¹⁷⁻³⁴). There is no life or substance in their teaching. They are likened to clouds which yield no rain for a parched soil, or are like trees that cumber up the ground while they are thoroughly dead and have no sign of life left even in their roots. They are noisy like the waters of the sea, but by their talking they merely display their own shameful characters and do not contribute to the building up of true religion. They would like to shine as stars in the heavens, but they are like shooting meteors that are destined to burn themselves out in eternal darkness. But Christians are not to be astounded at the presence of such persons in their midst. The coming of this sad day had been revealed beforehand in prophecy. Again it is the Book of Enoch, from which one learns that it would be necessary for God to send an angelic host to execute judgment upon just such sinners (Enoch 19 272).

The troublers seem to have been chronic fault-finders who complained about others but who followed their own lustful desires regardless of consequences, except as they were willing to act in a deferential manner toward anyone from whom they hoped to receive an advantage. Even more recently God had indicated that such persons were to appear within Christianity. The apostles themselves were believed to have foretold the present situation (v. 17). Where this prediction was found in apostolic tradition we do not now know, but the author would not have the readers think that these present unhappy conditions had not been anticipated by God and had not been provided for through apostolic instruction. The activity of persons who followed the impulses of their fleshly desires was but one of the many signs that the last days were at hand.

19-22. Correct Procedure for Christians. In contrast with Christians who walked by the Spirit, the false teachers were without the Spirit and lived under the domination of sensual appetites. Those who wished to continue in a way pleasing to God are to give themselves to prayer and a course of conduct dictated wholly by the promptings of the Holy Spirit. Thus will they continue to be the objects of divine love and in the Day of Judgment they will not feel the punishment of God's wrath but will share the joyous rewards of eternal life through the kindness of the Lord Jesus Christ. In their conduct toward the sinners in their midst they are also to show kindness and self-restraint (v. 22). Some of the offenders are as yet not utterly perverse, but are only wavering and may still be drawn back into the right way. The doubts that have been stirred up by the trouble-makers may be allayed. Others who have drifted further from the right course may be rescued by a more strenuous effort to snatch them from the fire of judgment before it is too late. But some of the sinners are so far gone in their pursuit of error that the most merciful procedure on the part of the faithful Christian is to look upon them with fear and to guard himself carefully from contamination by contact with their besmirched personalities.

24, 25. Benediction. Even this brief letter does not lack the typical farewell paragraph. The persons addressed are committed to the care of their own powerful God and Saviour. Their gaze is directed forward to the Judgment Day, when those Christians who have lived blamelessly will rejoice in the reward that is to be theirs who remain faithful to the Lord Jesus Christ.

REVELATION

By PROFESSOR F. BERTRAM CLOGG

INTRODUCTION

The Character of the Book. From about the third century B.C. the Law was established in Israel as the complete embodiment of God's revelation. No place was left, therefore, for men in whom the spirit of prophecy lived to give expression to fresh and independent messages of divine truth. Because of this, Jewish writers, who believed they had a message from God for their own time, used some great name of the past, such as Enoch or Moses, in order to hide their own identity and to win for their writings that respect which they would not otherwise have won. These apocalyptic writers, as they are called, used the forms of visions, by which the messages of the prophets had sometimes been disclosed; but they were concerned not so much with the present as with the future. They were in despair over the present, and they looked to the future to vindicate their hopes. They relied upon terrible revelations of supernatural powers in catastrophes of nature and in national upheavals to purge out the sins of humanity and lead men to God. This was because they believed that God was supreme over the world of nature and over all the political movements among the nations, as well as over the spiritual and ethical world. Moreover, their reliance upon a supernatural Messiah as the only hope of humanity was a witness to the fact that man cannot be saved by precept but only by example. The theme of the apocalyptists was the "Day of the Lord," and all the questions and problems which were connected with it. In the O.T. the book of Daniel belongs to this type of literature, in the N.T. the book of Revelation. This book differs from the others in some important respects. In the opinion of the present writer, it is not pseudonymous, but is written by the author under his own name. He writes in reference to a present crisis with a message for those in the churches which he mentions by name. Further, while the other apocalyptic writers foretell the coming of the Messiah, he reveals the coming again of a Messiah who has already triumphed over sin and death; who bears the marks now of his suffering; but who is on the throne of the universe. (See further, Intertestamental Literature, pp. 187-90; Intertestamental Religion, pp. 206-10; Backgrounds, pp. 843-7; cf. also on Jude.)

Methods of Interpretation. (1) Mystical. Origen, Augustine, and others have interpreted the book allegorically, each vision being symbolical of some principle or institution. The white horse, e.g., which descends through the open heaven (19^{11f.}) represents the pure light of knowledge which reveals heaven to believers. Such a method may be edifying, but tends to be merely fanciful. (2) Historical. The "futurists" say that it all refers to the end of the world. Others that it is a plan of history, some of which has been fulfilled, some is still to be. Others maintain that the writer wrote of his own century and had no other age in view. The vivid imagery, the mysterious predictions and the apparent references to events and persons in history have led to innumerable attempts to identify the Beast, etc., and to date the final struggle of good and evil. In the twelfth century the Beast was identified with Mohammedanism; in the sixteenth with the Papacy; in the eighteenth in England with Napoleon; and in the twentieth with the ex-emperor of Germany. The diversity of these interpretations has discredited the method, and no two attempts agree in the explanation of the book as the diagram of history. Moreover, the writer makes it clear that his prophecies will shortly be fulfilled, so that the reference to the end of the world, as it is commonly understood, is impossible.

There is no doubt, however, that the true method of interpretation is the historical. The visions clearly relate to events contemporary with John and his readers, and to future events insofar as they arise out of the others. The book refers to things that have happened, to definite kingdoms and powers and expectations. It is not an allegory, but the visions are not restricted to contemporary events. The last sixteen chapters describe a series of events which affect earth and heaven, which John expected would take place immediately, and which would bring human history to a definite end. The fulfillment of his prophecy has not taken place as John anticipated. There is a sense in which many crises in history have been a fulfillment, for no one single event or series of events can be a full and complete fulfillment. It is so with the expression of every great moral and spiritual truth made by the God-inspired men of all ages. Again and again history illustrates and vindicates their words in ways of which they never dreamed.

The Historical Situation. The Roman province of Asia in which the seven churches were situated was one of the most prosperous parts of the empire. The wealth of its cities was seen in the splendor of their public buildings and in their religious worship, where, amid magnificent architecture, stately public and private sacrifices were performed with lavish munificence, which not only made such occasions a splendid spectacle but a scene of luxurious feasting and every kind of sensual indulgence. The Christian who did not partake of such sacrificial feasts socially ostracized himself, and yet to partake meant grave moral temptation. It was no wonder that some were willing to compromise—the Nicolaitans, whom the writer censures in no measured terms (cf. 2:14f.).

But that form of heathenism which no Christian could avoid, however he might keep himself aloof from the social and commercial life of his fellow citizens, was the worship of the emperors, which was increasingly imposed upon all the inhabitants of the empire, whatever their race or religion. It was at Pergamum that a temple had first been built in honor of Augustus, and all his successors were in their turn deified, and similar temples were built in their honor. Domitian, in whose reign this book was in all probability written, was called, even in Rome, "Our Lord and our God." This Caesar-worship became the unifying religion of the empire; and in the provinces, where the benefits of Roman justice and peace were independent of the vices of particular emperors, it was sedulously encouraged by officials and priests as a matter of policy. Just because this religion was universal in its scope it clashed inevitably with the Christian faith. Rome was tolerant of all religions; all her subject races might worship their own gods, for each of whom a place was found in the Pantheon; but the deified emperor demanded the worship of all his subjects. An edict had been issued under Vespasian which condemned to death all who would not worship the image of the Beast (13:15). The magistrates had orders to treat the Christians as criminals, and this they did.

Paul had found the Roman power friendly. More than once it protected him from the Jews, who were the persecutors of the church in his day (Acts 21:31-34 23:12-24; cf. 27:42, 43). He writes favorably of this power as that which restrains "the mystery of lawlessness" (2 Thess. 2:6, 7), but the author of Revelation identifies it with the Beast, following the precedent set by the author of Daniel, who had pictured the world empires in the forms of a lion, a leopard, and so on. The readers of this book well understood that the Beast was Rome. The first time Rome became the persecutor of the Christians was in Nero's reign, when, in 64 A.D., to escape the opprobrium of having himself set the city on fire, Nero made the Christians the scapegoat and had his gardens lighted with Christians impaled on crosses smeared with pitch and set on fire. But that enormity was confined to those living in Rome. It was left for Domitian, morose, suspicious, cruel in the extreme, making war in his last mad years against almost all his subjects, to vent his worst fury on the Christians. In 93 A.D. the persecution raged not only in Rome but in Asia also, and the Christian blood poured out in the last four years of his reign seemed to John, the writer of this book, to presage a universal martyrdom for all who were loyal to their faith, and to cry aloud to God for vengeance (6:9). It was to encourage men to resist even unto blood the blasphemous claims of the Roman emperor that this "Tract for the Times" was written.

Authorship. The author of the book is John (14), who saw the visions in the island of Patmos, where he was suffering for his Christian faith. Patmos was a penal settlement, and it seems likely that John was condemned to work in the quarries there—a form of punishment which many of his fellow Christians had also suffered (19). Tradition associates him with Ephesus, and this is supported by his evident first-hand knowledge of the seven churches of the Roman province of Asia to which he writes, and of which Ephesus was the most famous. Almost certainly John was a Jew. In this too tradition and the internal evidence of the book agree. The Greek in which he writes has long been a puzzle to scholars, for it is not like any other Greek we know. The words are Greek, but the grammar and idiom are largely Semitic, and the most probable explanation is that the writer thought in Hebrew, often consciously or unconsciously framing his sentences after the manner of the prophets, and then translated them into Greek without strict regard for Greek idiom and style. A Jew who had lived in Asia all his life would have known Greek better than Hebrew or Aramaic (see p. 842). The author of Revelation probably lived in Palestine in his early years and did not go to Ephesus until middle life. This seems to support the tradition that he was John, the son of Zebedee, who is supposed to have settled at Ephesus, where he wrote the fourth Gospel and the three Epistles, and, as some think, wrote to the church there this book of visions.

But there are some serious difficulties in the way of this view. (1) The author of Revelation never calls himself an apostle, though the title, if he were the son of Zebedee, would have been natural, and would have supported his authority. He calls himself a prophet, an inferior position to an apostle (cf. 1 Cor. 12²⁸). (2) Grammar, diction, style, and theological outlook make it almost impossible to believe that the author of the fourth Gospel was the author of Revelation, though both may well have been members of the same religious circle in Ephesus. The author of this book mentions his name; the author of the Gospel does not. The former does not identify himself with the beloved disciple, or with the disciple who leaned on the breast of the Master at the Last Supper, or with the brother of James. When Revelation and the fourth Gospel use similar phrases the meaning is generally different; e.g., the Word in the Gospel is a metaphysical conception, in Rev. 19¹³ it is the name of Christ as the Warrior King. Again the conception of God in Revelation is much more like that of the O.T. than like that of the Gospel, where the love and Fatherhood are so much emphasized. The Gospel lays stress on the coming of the Spirit, and on a judgment which is spiritual; in Revelation the conception of the Second Coming and of the Judgment is in concrete symbolism. (3) There is another tradition mentioned by Papias that John and James were both martyred in Jerusalem. If true, then the son of Zebedee was the author neither of the fourth Gospel nor of Revelation. (4) At least two ancient authorities did not believe that the son of Zebedee was the author of Revelation but another John, called by Papias, the Elder. If, however, as many scholars hold, John the Elder was the author of the Gospel, then he was not the author of Revelation (see "2" above). The John who wrote the two shorter Epistles calls himself "the Elder," and these have much closer affinities with the First Epistle and the Gospel than with Revelation. (See further intro. to fourth Gospel, p. 1065, and intro. to Epistles of John, p. 1352.)

It is enough for us to know that the author was a Jew, probably of Palestine, who lived at Ephesus and was exiled to Patmos. Though his Greek was full of solecisms, and was evidently not the language in which he thought, he was far from being illiterate. He was steeped in the O.T., especially in the books of Isaiah and Ezekiel, as well as in the earlier apocalyptic literature, especially Daniel and Enoch, so that about one quarter of his book is either quotation from or allusion to some of these. Just as Bunyan wrote his allegory in the language of the English Bible, so John found it most natural to express his visions in the language of the prophets and apocalypticists who were before him.

The Purpose and Message of the Book. John wrote to encourage his fellow sufferers to be faithful unto death. His message is summed up in 17, "Behold, he cometh with the clouds," and in the testimony of Christ himself, "Behold, I come quickly" (22⁷). Antipas was probably typical of many who had died for the testimony of Jesus (21³). Rome was already intoxicated with the blood of the martyrs (17⁶). This book is an answer to the cry of the martyred, "How long, O Master . . . dost thou not . . . avenge our blood?" (610). The answer is that the time is at hand for God's final judgment upon the world and the vindication of the saints. Life was an intense struggle for the Christians in Asia, when any day might bring the ordeal Cæsar or Christ, and there was reason to fear that many would not be able to stand the strain. John by his searching exhortations and reassuring promises seeks to nerve the trembling faith of those who were dreading the future, to warn the faithful, and, by a proclamation of God's wrath upon the world, to summon the churches to endure, because the coming conflict will issue in the vindication and blessedness of the redeemed. Before that final consummation there is a series of events which he describes in the main section of his book. In these the struggle between good and evil grows continuously more intense because of the interposition of God himself on the one side and of the spiritual powers of darkness on the other. The preliminary judgments of God only harden men's hearts. But the issue is not uncertain, for it has been already decided in heaven (12⁷, 8). Satan has been defeated and cast out of heaven. That means the struggle is about to reach its climax on earth. But the armies of God are already moving against them. The victory has been already won in heaven; it will soon be finally accomplished on earth.

It is clear that these prophecies are related to Nero and Rome and have had no literal fulfillment. The truth which the book contains is not the truth of history. It is clear also that the moral and ethical standards of the author in reference to the non-Christian world and the purpose of God in letting loose almost indescribable horrors upon men are below the Christian level. But the permanent message of the book is its witness to the belief, which history has again and again proved to be true, that spiritual and not material forces are in the end the strongest. On the one side are the kings of the earth and all the powers of evil and on the other the Lamb that had been slain. The victory is not to the big battalions but to sacrificial love. The Beast and his armies stand for those forces of corruption which tyrannize over mankind: the Son of man on his white horse with the armies of heaven represents the spiritual powers which in the end will prevail, the power of truth, love, justice, and peace.

True to the spiritual insight of his race, John saw the Golden Age in the future, not in the past. But he does not expect this age to be reached gradually but through gathering crisis, and as the issue of an awful struggle. He was too conscious of the evil elements in humanity to have any easy dreams. He knew that the nearer evil was to its defeat the more violently it would resist. So though he wrote when the outlook for the church was at its blackest, he was no pessimist. The very menace of universal martyrdom he makes the basis of hope, and, when little could be heard from the church but the cry of suffering, he heard the Hallelujahs of a triumphant host in heaven and saw a blessedness which even he is unable to describe.

The Unity of the Book and the Method of the Revelations. The difficulties of explaining the book as a whole and of reconciling the internal indications of authorship and date, as well as the strong Jewish tone which pervades much of it, have led many scholars to suggest that the book is not the work of one author. These suggestions have taken many forms, some maintaining that this is a Jewish work to which some Christian has added an Introduction (chs. 1-3), and an Epilogue (ch. 22), and a few interpolations here and there. Others suppose several sources, some Jewish and some Christian, loosely put together by an editor. But more and more the unity of the book is being accepted, although John almost certainly used apocalyptic material taken from many sources. As the prophet of the O.T. said, "Thus saith Jehovah," so John wrote "I saw." The one heard the voice of God, the other saw the vision. But similar psychical experiences are common to both prophet and seer. Dreams and visions, in sleep and waking moments, are familiar in the experience of O.T. prophets and Jewish apocalyptists as means for conveying the revelation of God. Modern psychology does not deny the reality of such experiences, but their value is to be judged by the source from which they come and the influence they have on character. That which distinguishes the visions of the Bible from most of those known in other religions is the sort of religious faith they express and their power to uplift moral standards. The elaborate nature of the visions of Revelation shows that John had seen things which he only partly understood and which he could not express except by symbols. The symbols he used belonged to his conscious experience and to the apocalyptic traditions he had inherited. Naturally, he expressed what he had heard and seen in the thought forms peculiar to him and his age. He is trying to describe things beyond the range of his readers' experience, things he had seen in his ecstasies: the images he uses have to be symbolic and cannot be literal. But his description of his psychical experiences is arranged by the reason. The visionary in this book is a literary artist. It may well be that the visions extended over several years, but they are woven together into one book, in which can be seen a steady development of movement and thought. John has arranged and adapted his material into an ordered whole which is a dramatic unity. He not infrequently uses allegory, as in the visions of the seven seals and of the seven bowls, and he freely uses traditional material (e.g., 11¹⁻¹³) which passing through his thought becomes in whole or in part transformed. In recounting his visions he has woven in fragments of O.T. prophecy and Jewish apocalypse, as well as his own thoughts upon his ecstatic experiences, and we cannot distinguish what he had seen from these reminiscences and thoughts and prophecies which are all worked into his book.

The Date. That the book belongs to a later than the Pauline era is evident from the condition of the churches, the presence of Nicolaitanism (2⁶), and the widespread persecution. Ancient tradition was almost unanimous in assigning the book to the later years of Domitian's reign, when the emperor's demand for divine honors, his widespread use of informers, and his special enmity against the Christian Church established a reign of terror from which there was no relief till his death in 96 A.D. With this most modern scholars agree. The Cæsar-worship against which John wrote so vehemently was not stringently enforced until Domitian's reign. Nor did the persecution of Nero's reign extend beyond Rome. It was not till Domitian's edict that Asia became the scene of persecution against the Christians. Some scholars have suggested an earlier date, the time of Nero, because in 11^{1, 2} the Temple is spoken of as if still standing, and that was not true after 70 A.D. Others suggest the time of Vespasian, because of the allusions in 17¹⁰ to the death of Nero, and the identification of the reigning emperor with Vespasian. This view is held by those who attribute this book and the fourth Gospel to the son of Zebedee, and who feel that considerations of style demand that there should be some interval between the writing of this and the writing of the Gospel, which is generally thought to belong to the last decade of the first century. But these difficulties are adequately met by the suggestion that in these passages John is using material which belongs to an earlier time, and he has not in all points adapted it to the time when he was writing.

The Problem of the Rearrangement of Chapters 20-22. The problem is created by the following facts: (1) In 20⁴-21⁸ are related events from the imprisonment of Satan until all things are made new. Heaven and earth have passed away; the Last Judgment has settled the destiny of all sinners and the powers of evil, while the saints are reigning in the new Jerusalem. (2) In 21⁹-22² is described the heavenly Jerusalem which stands on the old earth and is surrounded by heathen nations and their kings, who bring their glory into it. (3) In 22¹⁵ evil in every form exists outside this city, though in 20¹¹⁻¹⁵ it appears that all who are not redeemed are destroyed.

These contradictions have puzzled all commentators. Some suppose that John is using material derived from different sources, and has not formed it into a consistent whole. But there is no evidence of different sources in these chapters. Others explain the apparent confusions on psychological grounds; consistency is not to be expected in mystic visions; but there has been up to this point a wonderful consistency in this book. Only here in the dénouement the orderly development of the drama fails. R. H. Charles' solution is drastic but illuminating. The key to it is that there are two cities described; the first, the seat of the millennial reign of Christ on earth, 21⁹-22², and the second, 21^{1-4a} 22³⁻⁵, the new, i.e., transformed Jerusalem which appears after the heaven and earth have vanished away, and is the abode of the blessed forever. Charles thinks that John died when he had written as far as 20³, and that the rest was left in a series of independent documents which a disciple not very intelligently put together. Whether or not that is the source of the confusion in these chapters, the rearrangement removes many of the difficulties and provides a fitting climax to the visions of the book. The order is thus restored: 20¹⁻³ 21^{9-22²}, 14, 15, 17 20⁴⁻¹⁵ 21^{5a}, 4d, 5b, 1-4abc 22³⁻⁵

21^{5a}, 6b-8 22⁶, 7 22^{18a}, 16, 13, 12, 10 22⁸, 9, 20, 21. If this order in the main is followed, 21^{9f}. is meant to supplement 19⁶⁻⁹ as 17^{1f}. supplements 14⁸. The portrait of the Bride is in contrast with the picture of Satan imprisoned. Planted on the same site as the Jerusalem which Roman armies razed to the ground a new city appears, where the martyrs are to dwell for one thousand years. It is to be the center from which the gospel is preached to the surrounding nations, and many will be converted and enter into it, but all that is unclean must remain outside (22¹⁴, 15). When the one thousand years are ended Satan is unloosed and gathers the forces of the heathen and attacks the city, but is defeated, and with the Beast and the False Prophet is cast into the lake of fire (20⁷⁻¹⁰) to be tormented forever. The general resurrection and the Last Judgment follow. Those who were outside the heavenly Jerusalem during its existence on earth (22¹⁵) are condemned to this lake of fire, which is the second death (20¹⁴). The old heaven and earth pass away, and a new heaven and earth, such as suit the new conditions of life, appear. From this new heaven comes the new Jerusalem, where God and his saints are to dwell forever. There is no elaborate description of this city, but it is expressly said that there shall be no death or sorrow or anything accursed in it (21¹⁻⁸). John could not describe this transformed Jerusalem in terms of material measurements or fabrics. Though he had seen it in his vision, its description belonged to those unspeakable things of which Paul writes in 2 Cor. 12⁴. It may be noted that this conception closely agrees with 1 Thess. 4¹³⁻¹⁷ 1 Cor. 15²³⁻²⁸, 35-49. Paul there says that the last trumpet shall sound, and Christ will appear, and the righteous dead will rise to meet him with their spiritual bodies, together with the righteous living, who will be similarly and suddenly transformed. Then begins the reign of Christ, which is to continue until he has put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy is death: the climax of his victory is the destruction of death (Rev. 20¹⁴). The Messianic kingdom comes to an end when Christ is triumphant. Then he delivers up the kingdom to God, who is all in all. Though there are important differences, the two conceptions agree in general.

Outline and Analysis. Many attempts have been made to analyze the book into acts and scenes. While it is helpful to liken the main part to a drama, it is pressing it too far to try to fit the whole into some dramatic scheme. Indeed, the appropriateness of the term "drama" in any sense is doubted by some scholars, who deny that there is any movement in the plot but only a repetition. In the analysis that follows, it will be seen that there certainly is a climax to the series of visions, and the word "drama" is the most fitting term to apply to the whole. The rearrangement of the last three chapters follows in the main that of Archdeacon Charles, to whose monumental work all students of this book are indebted. (See commentary on ch. 20-22.)

OUTLINE

Preface and Salutation, 11-8.

- I. Prologue on earth, 19-20.
- II. Letters to the Seven Churches, chs. 2, 3.
- III. Prologue in heaven, chs. 4, 5.
- IV. A Series of Judgments.
 - (a) First Series of Judgments—the Seals, ch. 6.
 - (b) Second Series of Judgments—the Trumpets, chs. 8, 9, 12, 13.
 - (c) Third Series of Judgments—the Bowls, followed by the doom of Rome, the victory of Christ and the chaining of Satan for a thousand years, 151-203.
 - (d) Three Parentheses, chs. 7; 10, 11; 14.
- V. The Millennial Kingdom, 204-10 219-222.
- VI. The Last Judgment, 2011-15.
- VII. The New Jerusalem, 211-5 226-12, 16, 18-20.

Benediction, 2221.

ANALYSIS

1. Preface and salutation, rising into an address of praise to the Almighty. 11-8.
2. Prologue on earth. The Seer, and the vision of the things which are and which shall be hereafter. 19-20.
3. The letters to the seven churches, which set out the problem of the book—the apparent failure of the cause of God on earth. Chs. 2, 3.
4. Prologue in heaven. The vision of God to whom the world owes its origin and of the Lamb to whom it owes its redemption. The Lamb takes the book of fate sealed with seven seals, the loosing of which represent judgments. Chs. 4, 5.
5. (a) The seven seals—the first series of judgments, which affect all men. Ch. 6.

The first parenthesis. Before the seventh seal is opened the saints are marked with the seal of God to prevent them from being affected by the next judgment. Then is seen a vision of the sealed and martyred host in heaven. Ch. 7.

(b) The seven trumpets (chs. 8, 9)—the second series of judgments making manifest the servants of God and of Satan. The seventh seal is opened and there is silence in heaven for half an hour to mark the change from history to prophecy. Then seven angels sound their trumpets and the last three sound three woes. The third of these is the reign of anti-Christ on earth; but before this is described there is

The second parenthesis. Ch. 10 shows that the hour prayed for by the martyrs has come. God's purpose will be fulfilled. The Seer is given a little book to eat. Before the third woe he then inserts two songs in heaven, which show that though what follows is apparently the triumph of Satan the real result is the coming of Christ and his kingdom. Chs. 10, 11.

The third woe—the reign of anti-Christ. Chs. 12, 13.

The third parenthesis. Two visions of the church triumphant on earth and of the judgment of Rome. Ch. 14.

(c) The third series of judgments, which affect the heathen—the seven bowls—and the powers of evil. Beginning with the song of the martyrs, this act describes the judgment of the great Harlot and of the Beast, the vision of the victorious Christ, and the binding of Satan for a thousand years. 151-203.

6. The millennial kingdom. 219-222, 14, 15, 17 204-10.
7. The last Judgment, in which Satan who has been loosed at the end of the thousand years and his allies are cast into the lake of fire. Heaven and earth have vanished and there is a great white throne before which the dead appear for judgment. 2011-15.
8. The new Jerusalem, where the saints reign for ever. 211-5a 223-5.
9. Epilogue. 215b-8 226-12, 16, 18-21.

Literature: C. Anderson Scott, Revelation (Century Bible), and The Book of the Revelation (Devotional and Practical Commentary); Alexander Ramsay, Revelation (Westminster N.T.); W. M. Ramsay, The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia; Peake, The Revelation of John; Charles, Schweich Lectures on the Apocalypse; Dean, Visions and Revelations; Thorn, Visions of Hope and Fear; Workman, Persecution in the Early Church.

CHAPTER I

1-3. The Source, Contents, and Blessed Significance of the Book. God gave the revelation to Christ who sent and signified it by his angel to John. John bare witness. The book contains the word of God, the word attested by Jesus Christ, seen by John in a vision. Similarly the blessing of the book is threefold: upon him who reads it in the public services of the church; upon the worshipers who hear it read; upon those who observe its teaching.

Our Lord's words about his Advent were interpreted in the light of current apocalyptic ideas, and to the expectation of the glory of that time the hope of the primitive church added the thought that the time is at hand (cf. 22²⁰). The end was near and would come with catastrophic suddenness, thought the early Christians. We have learned to think of agelong processes of development, continuous progress. But has not history records of crises of judgment as well as of years of steady growth? Progress does not move with uniform acceleration and in one unbroken line. In biology and in history life has developed in certain directions and then come to a dead end.

4-8. Greeting of John to the Seven Churches. This is the introduction to his letter to the seven churches: the rest of the book is the letter. He uses the apostolic salutation such as is found in many of the N.T. Epistles—a combination of the Greek grace and the Hebrew peace. "Grace and peace from God and from Christ Jesus: glory be to him—lo! he comes." The last is the motto of the book.

The writer uses no pseudonym, as is the custom of apocalyptic writers (intro., p. 1364). It is significant that he calls himself John only, without adding "apostle."

4. By Asia is meant the Roman province formed about 130 B.C. Seven was a sacred number. For the significance of these seven churches see v. 11. From him which is, etc. John breaks the rules of grammar here in order not to decline, as the rules of grammar require, the Greek translation of the sacred name for God, which the A.S.V. renders Jehovah. The rabbis paraphrased Ex. 31⁴ as "Who was and who is and who shall be." For the third phrase John uses who is coming, for "the Coming" is the theme of his book. And from the seven Spirits which are before his throne. This is generally understood as a reference to the Holy Spirit, the number seven expressing the perfection of God's energy and perhaps referring to the churches in which the Spirit works (cf. Isa. 11². 3). Others see a reference to the seven archangels, who may have been derived from the Babylonian cult of the star deities. But this, though Jewish, is foreign to John's thought. The order, in which the Holy Spirit—if that is the meaning—is put second, and the difficulty of the phrase, support Charles in regarding the words as an interpolation.

5. The first born of the dead (cf. Col. 1¹⁸). Foremost among the dead, sovereign among the living is the meaning. Unto him that loveth us and loosed us from our sins by his blood and hath made us to be a kingdom—not as R.V. The peculiar Greek is due to John's dependence upon a Hebrew idiom (intro., p. 1365b). The A.V. has washed for loosed—a weakly attested reading.

6. A kingdom, priests—based upon Ex. 19⁶ (cf. Isa. 61⁵, 66²¹). Those whom Christ has loosed from their sins are the true Israel, a society in which his will is realized. In the Messianic kingdom the glorified martyrs will be kings and priests to the nations as the true Israel was to be. But apart from that, there is an eternal kingship and priesthood of all the faithful. Corporately they are a kingdom, a holy nation, a theocracy. Individually they are priests having access through his blood into the Holy of Holies, offering living, reasonable, and spiritual sacrifices, making intercession for all men (Rom. 12¹ Heb. 13¹⁵).

7. John combines Dan. 7¹³ with Zech. 12¹⁰ (cf. Mt. 24³⁰, where the two passages are also combined in reference to the Advent). Jn. 19³⁷ quotes Zech. 12¹⁰ in reference to the crucifixion. John writes with prophetic certainty as though his eye already sees him coming. Every eye shall see him and all those who by their attitude to him share the guilt of those who crucified him, and all the tribes of the earth shall mourn [because of] him. Then follows the double asseveration, It is so, Amen. That event, which causes the faithful to lift up their hearts because their redemption is drawing nigh, causes consternation to those who have not been able to read the signs of the times.

8. This word from God himself is the climax. The Almighty is better rendered the All-ruler. It is the word used by the LXX to translate Lord of Hosts. There is some ground for supposing the verse is misplaced here, for it is not expected after the double asseveration of v. 7, and it seems to imply that John is already in a trance, whereas that follows. For the meaning of the verse see note on 22¹³.

9-20. The Prologue on Earth. The Call of John and the Vision of the Son of Man. The writer uses his name again, a sign of personal relationship to his readers. But he claims no title of authority, only he is a sharer with them in their trials, and he has seen a vision of the Son of man risen and glorified, and has been charged to tell of what he has seen. Fellowship in the tribulation and kingdom and endurance which is in Jesus (note the order) is characteristic of early Christian experience (cf. Lk. 12³² Rom. 5³ 2 Cor. 17). Endurance (patience) is put last because the struggle still remains, though the ultimate triumph is assured. It seems that John was not in Patmos now but had found himself there in consequence (not for the sake) of the word of God and the testimony of Jesus. Patmos was a small island off the southwest coast of Asia Minor used as a penal settlement.

10. John fell into a trance on the Lord's day. This is the first place in Christian literature where the Lord's day is named. The first day in each month was called Sebaste, the emperor's day, and Deissmann thinks a day of the week was so called. It was natural for Christians to call that day when they gathered for worship in the name of Him who died and rose again on the first day of the week the Lord's day. To do so was, moreover, a direct challenge to the emperor worship to which John refers so often in this book.

11. Ramsay points out that these churches all stand on the great circular road in the west central part of the province, so that they would serve as good centers of communication for the surrounding districts. But doubtless the number seven was chosen because of its symbolism for sanctity and completeness. These seven represent the universal church.

12. The thought of the golden candlesticks is based on Ex. 25³¹ and Zech. 4². But here there are seven candlesticks, which symbolize the churches whose function it is to embody and give forth God's light upon earth (v. 20).

13. Among the candlesticks is one like unto the Son of man (R.V. mg.). The reference is to Dan. 7¹³ and is to be understood here as a title of Messiah. In immediate relationship to the churches John perceives the churches' Lord. He moves among them as if he were the priest tending the lights, but he is no human priest. His robe down to his feet symbolizes his dignity, possibly his priesthood. The golden girdle suggests royalty.

14. The description of the Ancient of Days in Dan. 7^{9f.} is quite naturally transferred to the risen and glorified Christ, but the white hair, appropriate in Daniel, may perhaps have no special significance here, unless the ancient commentators are right in finding in it a reference to pre-existence. In the days of his flesh men noted the penetrating glance of Jesus and the indignation that sometimes burned in his eyes (cf. Mk. 35, 34). So here the glowing eyes represent the all-penetrating insight and consuming wrath of holiness against sin.

15. Read feet of burnished brass when it is smelted in the furnace. Strength and stability are suggested, power to trample down all enemies (Ezek. 17). Perhaps the roar of the Aegean around seagirt Patmos was in his mind when he wrote his voice [is] as the voice of many waters (cf. Ezek. 43²).

16. The seven stars representing the heavenly bodies are subject to him. The two-edged sword is the symbol of judicial authority (cf. "the word of God," 19¹³⁻¹⁵). Once on earth at the Transfiguration his face shone as the sun (Mt. 17²).

17, 18. The seer is overwhelmed at the vision. Fear not, says the one like unto a Son of man—a word of good cheer so often on the lips of Jesus. And he who held the seven stars in his hand laid that same hand upon his bewildered disciple. I am the first and the last—an O.T. title (see note on 22¹³)—and he that liveth and was dead—so the verse should read, the Greek translating a Hebrew idiom. He that liveth recalls many passages in the O.T. where Jehovah is contrasted with the dead gods of the Gentiles. Here the emphasis is on the living Christ whom death could not hold, for he has the keys of death and of Hades, the intermediate abode of the wicked in this book. He who has conquered death can rescue from its grasp all who trust him.

20. The secret meaning—that is the sense in which mystery is used here—of the stars and the candlesticks is the angels of the churches and the churches. The angels of the churches have been understood as (1) the messengers who take the letters; (2) the bishops of the churches—but angels must represent superhuman beings; so (3) their guardian angels; but the best interpretation is (4) the heavenly counterparts or representatives of the churches and the candlesticks are the actual churches. The one represents an ideal, the other the reality. Christ holds in his hand the stars, which are the angels of the churches, and the candlesticks. He has the ideals in his power: in him alone they can be realized. By the angels is personified the essential spirit of the churches.

The significance of this vision is that among these churches which were typical in their weakness and their strength of the universal church there moves the risen Christ. They were surrounded by paganism, but their Lord held them in his hand. Persecution, however severe, can be borne if it is seen against the background of the eternal order. Material power and physical force are not the dominant factors. The Lord who became dead and who is alive for evermore, he is the Lord of life, he is the arbiter of human history.

CHAPTER II

The Letters to the Seven Churches (chs. 2, 3). Theories that these letters are from another hand and do not belong to the book are not proven. The whole book is cast in the form of a letter which, as the N.T. shows, had proved itself a useful form of literary composition (cf. p. 854). It is true that in some passages it is expected that the church will survive until the last Advent (2²⁵ 3³), whereas the expectation of the rest of the book is that a universal martyrdom will take place before that event (cf. 13¹⁵). Therefore Charles thinks that John wrote these specific letters some time before he wrote Revelation, and that he himself edited them, adapting them as messages to the universal church when he wrote the book of which they are now an integral part. This is doubtful, but it is clear that in each letter he is writing with an intimate knowledge of the individual church, and it is equally clear that the message is to the church universal. In the geographical features and political history of each city, John, writing for Jesus, the true Lord of the churches, sees forces that mold the character of men. The church is in a sense the city with distinct characteristics and in each case with a distinct destiny.

1-7. The Message to the Church in Ephesus. Ephesus was the capital of the province of Asia. Situated at the western terminus of the great system of Roman roads in Asia it was foremost in commerce, and as Temple-warden (cf. Acts 19³⁵) it played a great part in the religious life of the province. This title was given for the city's devotion to Artemis, whose temple was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. But the title meant also that the city was warden of the imperial cult. We have a coin on which are represented a shrine and altar to Augustus within the sacred precinct of Artemis. A temple had been erected in the city to Claudius or Nero, and later other temples were erected to other emperors. The city was a hotbed of every kind of superstition. The Ephesian books were notorious (cf. Acts 19¹⁹). After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the chief center of the Christian faith in the East. Those who were traveling from the East to Rome and back mostly passed through Asia. Perhaps as the result of the persecution threatening when John was writing, the city is called by Ignatius "the passage way of those who are slain unto God," i.e., the place through which passed so many on their way to martyrdom in the amphitheater at Rome.

The church in Ephesus has a record of labor and of patience, especially of the labor of resisting false teachers, and of the brave patience with which the Christian faces the hindrances and trials which beset him. John emphasizes this patience and steadfastness and describes their motive as for my name's sake (v. 3). But the controversies with those who called themselves apostles and were not had apparently caused faction and division in the church (cf. Acts 20²⁹, 30), and the Ephesians had lost the enthusiastic love they had shown in the days of Paul (Acts 20³⁷). The first glow of the awakened spiritual life had passed. Perhaps their concern for orthodoxy had made them censorious. The writer of the fourth Gospel and the first Epistle lays much emphasis on "love of one another," and he also writes to Ephesus. John recalls the three stages of their conversion—remember, repent, do (v. 5). Then follows a threat as to the fate of Ephesus, if it does not heed the warning, her lampstand shall be moved out of its place. The lampstand means the church, and most commentators read this as a threat of destruction and point to the fulfillment of the prophecy in that all that remains on the site of the once famous city is a railway station and a few huts; the rest has been buried by the dust of the ages. Ramsay sees in these words a threat not to destroy but to uproot the city and its church and to move it to a new spot. For he emphasizes change as the characteristic of its history. The site and scenery of the city constantly varied; what was land at one time was water at another; where once was a teeming population was a bare hillside again; the great harbor where Paul landed is a marsh to-day. But the message does not end with a threat. In the matter of the Nicolaitans (v. 6) and their pernicious teaching the Ephesian church was true and sound (cf. 2¹⁴, 15). Then follows the promise that to the Ephesian who in the persecution wins the crown of martyrdom—overcometh—it shall be given to eat of the tree of life (v. 7). The Christian life is constantly described as a warfare in the N.T. There is no discharge from that warfare, but he who becomes a victor in it wins the right to eat of the tree of life which is in the paradise of God, the street of the heavenly Jerusalem (22²). That tree is the symbol of immortality.

1. The cities may be likened to a circlet of jewels which Christ holds in his hand.

There is the contrast between the ideal light of the star and the actual light of the lamp.

2. There were many itinerant preachers and the Christian Church had to test them. The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, a recently discovered document of the sub-apostolic age, gives careful warning about this. Ignatius bears witness to the discrimination of the Ephesian church in respect to those who brought evil doctrine.

6. The Nicolaitans have been interpreted as (1) the followers of Nicolas (Nicolaius) the deacon (Acts 65), an early guess which has little or no justification; (2) the Balaamites. "Nicolaios" is probably a translation of "Balaam," meaning "he has consumed the people." The followers of Jezebel were a part of this sect (214, 15, 20). They converted the liberty of the gospel into license, carrying to an extreme the doctrine of those whom Paul had to rebuke at Corinth for trying to carry over into Christianity the pagan divorce between religion and morality (1 Cor. 5). The Nicolaitans were idolaters and fornicators.

8-11. The Message to the Church at Smyrna. Smyrna was some fifty miles north of Ephesus and disputed with the latter the title of chief city of Asia. Its loyalty to Rome had been conspicuous: a temple to Tiberius had been built there, so that Smyrna, like Ephesus, had the honor of being called Temple-warden.

The description of Christ as he who was dead and came to life is specially appropriate for this city, which in the sixth century B.C. was destroyed by the Lydians and after four hundred years was refounded. John is aware of the suffering of the church; but, as he knows the city triumphed over death, so he sees it is rich in reality despite its material poverty. He knows that the hatred of the Jews, i.e., of those of them who claim to be Jews but really are no synagogue of Jehovah but of Satan, has been violent against the church. An illuminating example of this hatred is in the way the Jews of the city, even violating the Sabbath, brought faggots into the stadium to burn Polycarp in 155 A.D. Further suffering will come upon them: the devil will cast some of them into prison (v. 10), the usual prelude to martyrdom. But loyalty was characteristic of Smyrna. John does not disdain this appeal to civic patriotism to remind them that loyalty to Christ will win the crown of life. "The hill Pagos, with the stately public buildings on its rounded top, and the city spreading out down its rounded slopes," had made the crown of Smyrna a familiar phrase. On coins the city is represented as a figure with a mural crown upon her head.

But the Christian martyr will receive no crown of towers, no garland of an athlete, destined to fade (Smyrna was famous for its games), but a crown which belongs to the eternal life. Neither the death which he suffers as a martyr nor the death which follows the final Judgment can harm him (cf. 206).

12-17. The Message to the Church at Pergamum. Pergamum was some fifty miles from Smyrna and fifteen from the coast. Commercially it was falling behind Ephesus and Smyrna, which were better situated for trade, but it was superior to both in official and religious importance. Behind the town was a hill, one thousand feet high, crowned with temples to Zeus, Soter, Athena, Dionysus, Æsculapius. The last was the most famous, and because of it the city had a great school of medicine. But the most significant thing about the city to John was that here the first temple in Asia was dedicated to the emperor worship. Prior to Ephesus and to Smyrna, Pergamum was a Temple-warden. She was the center of the imperial cult—where the throne of Satan is—which menaced the very existence of the Christian Church.

It is fitting that, in this message to the church in the city where official authority resided, Christ should be described as he that hath the two-edged sharp sword (cf. 116), i.e., as possessing absolute and universal authority, that power of life and death symbolized by the sword, which was vested in the proconsul of the province. John bears witness to the loyalty of the church to the Name in the city where men were confronted with the alternative of worshiping Cæsar or receiving sentence of death. Antipas my faithful witness (the word here is probably equivalent to "martyr," its common meaning in the next century) is mentioned as representative of many who had proved their loyalty thus in Pergamum. But there was a minority in the church of Pergamum that held the teaching of Balaam, the prototype of all false teachers (see note on v. 6). It was the Nicolaitans that troubled the Christians of Pergamum as well as those of Ephesus. The danger was of compromise between Christianity and the state religion. What harm was there in burning incense to the emperor? Why make life so intolerably difficult by refusing to take any part in the social and civic life of Pergamum because there were immoral practices associated with it? They were under grace, not under Law. But John, like Paul, saw that this argument belonged to the deep things of Satan. The church must not lower the standard; either it must conquer the imperial idolatry or be itself destroyed.

17. To him who refused to compromise the promise is that he shall have of the hidden manna. According to 2 Baruch 29⁸ the treasury of manna which was in the ark, which Jeremiah was thought to have hidden in a cave on Mount Sinai, was to descend from heaven during the Messianic kingdom and the blessed were to eat of it. The meaning here is that he who abstains from forbidden meats will be fed by bread from heaven. Further than that, the victor in this fight will receive a white stone and a new name written upon it. Probably this is to be explained as an amulet with some magical name by which the possessor could secure entrance into heaven. Popular superstition in the power of a secret name to open closed portals and to give the user supernatural powers was widespread. He who has kept the Name in the Christian warfare shall receive a symbol of transcendent powers: upon it is inscribed the name that is above every name, the name that marks the recreation of his personality as son of God and heir of heaven.

18-29. The Message to the Church in Thyatira. Thyatira was about forty miles southwest of Pergamum, a Lydian city on the borders of Mysia. This and Philadelphia were the least famous of the seven cities, but the message to Thyatira is the longest of all. Inscriptions show that Thyatira was remarkable for the number of its trade-guilds. It is these which are the danger to the church.

Christ is here called the Son of God, a challenge to the title which the imperial cult applied to Cæsar. The further description of the eyes that flash with indignation, and the feet that can tread down his enemies, is specially appropriate in view of the severity of the message. The works of the church are praised: love and faith, service and endurance. And unlike the Ephesians the Thyatirans were progressing in good works. But there was a Jezebel calling herself a prophetess who was corrupting members of the church and teaching them immorality and idolatry (v. 20). The common meal of the trade-guilds, such as that of the workers in bronze (cf. v. 18), involved participation in eating food offered to idols. It was not possible to belong to such a guild and not participate in banquets at which acknowledgment of heathen deities was made, and at which there might be orgies of licentious revelry. Perhaps it was argued the worship was a mere form, and the Christian need not deny his Christian faith by it, as he need not participate in the obscene practices. Perhaps some claimed that the Christian ought to know the deep things, evil as well as good. "All things are lawful," they may have asserted (cf. 1 Cor. 210). At any rate both in his social and business life this trade-guild was most important for the artisan and workman. What was the Christian to do? In Ephesus the lax doctrine of the Nicolaitans, who allowed Christians to participate in all the practices of such guilds, was rejected (26), but at Thyatira the church was silent, because of the presence of an influential woman, who had long and notoriously advocated the principles of the Nicolaitans. She cloaked her activities under the name of prophetess and her teaching under the title of broad-mindedness, liberalism, but she was really a modern Jezebel (see below on v. 20).

The problem of the Thyatirans is always before the church. Life in an old-established and highly organized society involves contact with practices of which the Christian cannot approve. To live up to the Christian ideals is inevitably to clash with many customs of the world, though that world is nominally Christian to-day instead of wholly pagan, as in Thyatira. How far ought one to overlook things of which he did not approve? Did not Paul agree (1 Cor. 5) that it was not necessary to leave the world severely alone? To John the issue is clear. Should the church conform with the ordinary customs of society or be at war with them? To have conformed would have reduced Christianity to a cult. The religion that was to win the victory over the empire was made of sterner stuff; and it was due to the insight of the author of this book that the issue was so clearly presented. The specious prophetess of Thyatira had been warned how superficial and wrong were her pleas. Now her punishment is announced (v. 22). She is to be cast on a bed of suffering, and with her those who, misled by her influence, had tried to combine Christianity with paganism: those who were her spiritual progeny were to perish by plague. And so when the news spread through the province all the churches would know that Christ searcheth the will and affections and thoughts (the reins and the heart) and renders to each his due (v. 23).

But not all in Thyatira were thus misled, not all knew the depths of knowledge, as these called them, depths not of God but of Satan. Upon the faithful the two commands of the apostolic decrees were imposed: abstain from food offered to idols and from fornication (Acts 15²⁸). Let them keep these rules until the Lord come. Their reward shall be to share in the Messianic kingdom (vv. 25, 26). V. 27 read and he shall break them with a rod of iron, as the potter's vessels shall they be dashed in pieces. The prophecy has been fulfilled in the social and national systems which have been destroyed by the influence of the church, and at the same time in the influence upon national life and character which the church has exercised. The promise ends with the difficult words I will give him the morning star. In 22¹⁶ this is a title of Christ (see note). After the tribulation, when he has won through, the reward is Christ, or, as Moffatt interprets it, eternal life. Perhaps the meaning is less definite—the future belongs to the Christian who has proved himself more than conqueror.

20. Other interpretations of Jezebel are (1) the wife of the bishop, because of the variant reading thy wife for the woman Jezebel. This rests probably on a wrong reading and certainly on a wrong interpretation of the angels of the churches. (2) The Chaldee Sibyl: but Jezebel is obviously a member of the church.

24. The deep things of Satan is otherwise interpreted as a boast of the libertines, who claimed that the spiritual man should know the deep things of Satan, i.e., should take part in heathen practices but remain unaffected by them.

CHAPTER III

See introductory paragraph to ch. 2.

1-6. The Message to the Church in Sardis. Sardis was the old capital of Lydia, a third-rate city in Roman times notorious for its licentiousness. Its characteristics here are degradation, false pretension, and death.

The description of Christ—he who has the seven Spirits of God and the seven stars—emphasizes him as wielding his divine power in the seven churches, perhaps in contrast with the deadness of a church which was only nominally alive. But in spite of the spiritual death there is made this final appeal. Be watchful—a word the church of Sardis would find specially appropriate. For twice the supposedly impregnable city, high in a rocky plateau, had fallen into the hands of the enemy through lack of vigilance. The steep rock was unguarded and by that unguarded way the soldiers of Cyrus like a thief captured the city, ruled by Croesus, in 549 B.C. And in similar way Antiochus the Great took the city in 218 B.C., because the garrison did not watch the side they thought could not be scaled. John bids them to be watchful and to reconstruct on a firm basis whatever remained out of the wreck of the city but was now ready to die. For the works of Sardis have been deficient in God's sight, however complacent the church is about them. Remember, keep, repent: that is the message (v. 3). It is noteworthy that Sardis and Philadelphia are not attacked from within by heresy nor from without by persecution, yet they are the least satisfactory of the churches. Perhaps they would have been regarded as flourishing and successful churches, yet they are most to be criticized of the seven. Sardis appeared to be a live church full of various activities, but moral contamination had sapped her spiritual vitality. Yet Sardis, though in a critical, is not in a hopeless condition. There are a few persons even in Sardis who have not besmirched the professions made in baptism (v. 4). For them is spoken the gracious and tender promise that they shall continue to the end white and pure as they had continued amid the notorious impurities of their city. Those who are victorious shall receive white garments, i.e., spiritual bodies represented as robes of light and glory in the resurrection life. Those who resist the spiritual death which is characteristic of many in the church shall have their names enrolled forever among the citizens of the city of God, and their names shall be acknowledged before God.

5. The book of life (cf. 20¹²) is derived from the O.T., where a divine register of men is mentioned in Ex. 32³² (cf. Ps. 69²⁸ Isa. 43). The idea is developed in apocalyptic literature. To have one's name erased from the book of life meant exclusion from the heavenly kingdom: to have one's name retained was the symbol of eternal fellowship with God and his people.

7-13. The Message to the Church in Philadelphia. Philadelphia was about twenty-eight miles southeast of Sardis—an ancient city, which in the first century A.D. had suffered much from earthquake shocks. The chief pagan cult was that of Dionysus, the god of wine, as was natural in a vine-growing district: but the Christian Church suffered more from Jewish than from pagan opponents. The Christianity of Philadelphia was of a high character. This missionary church was neither vexed by heresy nor shamed by heathen practices.

Christ is described as the Holy par excellence, the true, the genuine Messiah, who has complete authority to admit or to exclude from the city of David. As the prophet (Isa. 45¹⁴) anticipated the submission of the Gentiles to Israel, so the Philadelphians are bidden to anticipate that these Jews—who have belied their name and its privileges—will submit to the church, the true Israel of God. Philadelphia had kept (v. 8) the gospel of patient endurance which Christ exemplified, and Philadelphia shall be kept when the testing time for the whole world which was imminent came. The time is short before the Second Advent (v. 11), and because Philadelphia is to be kept in the hour of trial she is to guard (hold fast) the prize which might otherwise be taken from her and given to one who is more faithful (Mt. 25²⁸). After the great earthquake of 17 A.D. few people ventured to live in the city owing to the continuance of minor shocks. The record of that experience, a little more than half a century earlier, made the promise to the Philadelphian victor more appropriate that he should go out from the city no more (v. 12). The Philadelphians knew what it was to live in expectation of the hour of trial. But the victor in the Christian contest shall be firm as a pillar upon which the Temple rests: he shall be shaken by no disaster in the great day of trial. After the great earthquake, because of the kindness the city received from Tiberius, Philadelphia received another name, Neo-Cæsarea, meaning the city of the young Cæsar, either Tiberius or Germanicus. So the name of the imperial God was written on this city. That explains the significance of new name in v. 12. The Christian martyr shall have written on his forehead the name of God, for he is his possession; the name of the city of God, for he has the right of citizenship; and the new name of Christ, which will be revealed when he comes. It is significant that Philadelphia, living in constant danger of earthquakes, was the city that in subsequent history, long after all the surrounding cities had passed under Turkish domination, alone held up the banner of Christianity.

7. He that hath the key of David. Perhaps the synagogue that claimed to be the synagogue of Jehovah but was really the synagogue of Satan (v. 9; cf. 2⁹) had excommunicated the Philadelphian Christians. But they had no authority to open or shut the door into the Kingdom. Christ who had the key had set before the Philadelphians an open door which none could shut. One day the contemptuous Jews would learn their mistake and seek to be taught by the Christians whom they had thought to shut out of the privileges of the true Israel.

8. A door opened. This is generally understood as an opportunity for missionary effort (cf. 1 Cor. 16⁹). Moffatt refers it to Christ, the door of the sheep; but Bousset renders it the door of entrance into the Messianic glory. The door of spiritual privilege seems not inappropriate here.

12. It is not clear whether it is to be rendered I will write upon him the name of my God or upon it, i.e., upon the pillar. If the latter, the reference is probably to the fact that the priest of the cult of the emperors after his year of office erected his statue in the temple with his and his father's names upon it, his place of birth and year of office. The statue was a perpetual memorial to his priesthood. So should the faithful stand in the temple of God. And upon him would be written God's name, the name of the city and the sacred name which gives power to the user.

14-22. The Message to the Church in Laodicea. Laodicea was only a few miles from Colossæ (Col. 4^{15, 16}), and the church there was probably founded by Epaphras of Colossæ (Col. 17 4¹²). The city was great and rich, so much so that it disdained the help of the emperor when it was destroyed by the earthquake in 60 A.D. It was a banking center, famous for the manufacture of black wool, carpets, and cloths, and had a flourishing medical school. There are several points of resemblance between this message and the Epistle to the Colossians which was to be read in Laodicea (cf. Col. 4¹⁶ and especially Col. 1¹⁸ 2⁷ 2²² 3 3¹). Most likely the writer knew this letter of Paul and the letter to Laodicea (Col. 4¹⁸).

The title of Christ emphasizes his authority: he is Amen, the true one who keeps covenant; his counsel and rebuke are authoritative; he is the supreme moral critic, the primary source of God's creation (Col. 1¹⁸). The indictment of the church that follows is uncompromising. Success in moneymaking is not the best proof of the higher qualities of citizenship. The wealth of the city, the energy that had made it a center of trade, did not conceal from the eye of the faithful and true witness the lukewarmness that was fatal to the highest side of human nature. What was true of the city was true of the church. There was money enough to support its enterprises; it was popular and well supported, for it did not set too high a standard of social or commercial life. Religious enthusiasm was characteristic of the natives of Phrygia, but Laodicea was a Greek city and was above all that. The church adopted a spirit of accommodation and of broad toleration, and was entirely self-satisfied. Proud of its prestige in the city, of its apostolic traditions, of its generosity and wealth, it had need of nothing (v. 17) in its own eyes.

The absolute rejection of religion is preferable to the half-hearted Laodicean expression of it. There is hope for the outsider, but for the Christian who is so only in name, who is content with the comparative warmth of a religion which is neither hot nor cold, there is expressed the divine disgust. Dante at the gate of Hell heard "sighs with lamentations and loud moans." Vergil explains that this was the fate of "those who lived without or praise or blame," that these Laodicean, neutral souls were driven forth from heaven and the depth of hell does not receive them. In this message it is made clear that the wealth and self-sufficiency of Laodicea are of no avail, though by them the city was rebuilt after the earthquake. There is a gold refined by fire (v. 18), but it is not paid to the man who compromises with his soul. The church that is rich toward God does not boast about it. Let Laodicea buy (but "without money and without price") the golden gift of a new heart of fellowship with Christ, for that means the white garments of the spiritual bodies, wherewith the righteous shall be clothed when the wicked remain disembodied (cf. 35), and that gift brings with it the vision of the things that are unseen and eternal. Of how much more value are these than the boasted riches or the glossy black cloths or the eye-salve which in the fame of men made the city renowned. But though the rebuke is so severe, it is from one whose love inflicts the discipline of suffering to win them back (cf. Prov. 3¹² Heb. 12⁶). So let them be zealous (v. 19; the tense implies that fervent enthusiasm must be a permanent element in their Christian character) and change their mind. This appeal is made more intimate by the picture of Christ knocking at the door of the individual heart (v. 20). How courteous for the Lord of the world to stand at the door not presuming to enter until he is invited. "God is always courteous," said Francis of Assisi, "and does not invade the privacy of the human soul." He who hearkens and opens will find Christ both guest and host, yes, and the feast too (Jn. 6⁵⁴). The common meal is the symbol to the Oriental for confidence and affection (Jn. 14²³ Lk. 24^{29, 30}).

21. The verse is eschatological—the Christian martyr shall reign with Christ—and is fulfilled in 20⁴. This is the conclusion to the messages to all the churches rather than to Laodicea only. The Christian is one in his experience with Christ in his struggle and in his victory (cf. Jn. 17²⁴).

CHAPTER IV

The Prologue in Heaven. With dramatic suddenness the scene changes from earth to heaven, from the churches with their imperfect works, their disloyalties, and their fears of martyrdom, to the heavenly hosts worshipping around the throne: from the restlessness and distractions of this world to the perfect peace and assurance of heaven (cf. Isa. 61⁴ Ezek. 124-28 Dan. 7^{9, 10}).

I-II. The Vision of the Sovereignty of Creative Power and of Redemptive Love. (See also ch. 5.) There stands a door in heaven already open. The seer in his vision hears the former voice, i.e., of the Son of man, bidding him come to see what must come to pass hereafter. He has seen the vision of things as they are on earth in chs. 2 and 3. He sees now a vision of things as they are in heaven. This is necessary for him in order that he may understand the future. Human history is to be rightly conceived only if seen sub specie eternitatis—against the background of the eternal order. In heaven stood a throne from under which came lightnings and thunders; before it were seven lamps of fire (v. 5) and a sea of glass (v. 6; cf. Ezek. 127, 28). Immediately surrounding the throne were four living creatures (v. 6) and in a wider circle outside them were twenty-four thrones and twenty-four elders upon them (v. 4). The living creatures and the elders join in songs of praise to God who sits upon the central throne. No form is visible, only the luster of the sardius (v. 3; perhaps a green translucent stone) and the blood-red jasper flashing through a nimbus of emerald green which concealed Him who sat upon the throne. The lightnings and the thunders recall the theophany in Ex. 19¹⁶ (cf. Heb. 12¹⁹). These with the seven lamps symbolize the purity and the energy in its perfection of the Divine Being. The sea is to be explained from Gen. 17, "the waters above the firmament," and in the Testimony of the Twelve Patriarchs a sea is described as hanging between the first and second heavens. Only a part of this is visible as it were a sea of glass like unto crystal (v. 6). The four living creatures are the cherubim: the description is derived from Isa. 6 and Ezek. 1. They are generally thought to represent the whole animate creation in the thought that the unresting activity of nature under its Creator is a ceaseless offering of praise to him. But in the Jewish hierarchy the angels of service are appointed over the world of nature and they are an inferior order. The cherubim in this book stand for the highest order of angels. In Ezekiel the cherubim have four faces each in the likeness of a lion, an ox, a man and an eagle, and have four wings. The description is similar but not the same here (v. 7). Beneath their wings they are full of eyes suggesting the unresting vigilance with which they guard the throne. Both the cherubim and the elders unite in a hymn of praise, the words of which interpret the significance of the scene. On earth men bowed in fear before Domitian, who claimed to be "Our Lord and our God" (Dominus et Deus noster). He had power of life and death over all his subjects. Only the Christians refused to bow the knee to him. For them there was only One who could claim worship and he was on the throne of the universe (v. 11). Creator, sovereign Lord of all—who should make them afraid?

3. Perhaps the emerald rainbow was understood as a protection for human eyes against the dazzling splendor of the glory of the Divine Presence. Anderson Scott suggests that it may refer to the freshness which follows rain and so to the seasons of refreshing from the presence of the Lord.

4. The twenty-four elders are variously interpreted: (1) as the twelve O.T. patriarchs and the twelve N.T. apostles—but that idea of the church is medieval; (2) as a group of angelic beings—originally Babylonian star-gods whom the Jews transformed into angels—but though they sit on thrones these elders do not act as judges; (3) as the angelic counterpart of the heads of the twenty-four priestly orders (cf. 1 Chr. 24⁷⁻¹⁸), for they later perform the priestly ministry of offering the golden bowls of incense. This is the best explanation. Charles suggests that they may be intended here to represent the faithful, all of whom are kings and priests.

9. According to a Hebrew idiom the translation should probably be and whenever the living creatures give—a description of the regular order of divine worship in heaven.

11. They were and were created; i.e., by thy will they first existed in the world of thought, and then by one definite act they were created.

CHAPTER V

1-14. The Vision Continued. (See ch. 4.) This chapter shows the relation between the scene of worship in heaven just described and the world. John sees a book in the right hand of him that sat on the throne (cf. Ezek. 21⁰), a book roll, so full that it was written on both sides, and he could see the writing on the reverse side as the book was held up. This he feels convinced is the book of destiny containing the things that shall be. But the divine counsels are a profound secret, the book is sealed with seven seals. A strong angel challenged anyone to open this fateful book and the seer was distressed because there was no response. He wept because he feared the revelations could not be disclosed. Then he was told that the strong scion of Judah's tribe, David's offspring (Isa. 11¹⁻¹⁰), would open the book (v. 5). He looked to see a conqueror; he expected power and strength, and he saw a Lamb; he looked to see one who should slay his foes, and he saw a Lamb as though slain in sacrifice, with all the appearance of wounds (cf. Jn. 20^{25, 27}), yet not dead but alive.

But the Lamb does not lack power—he has seven horns, symbolical of power and kingly dignity, and he has seven eyes betokening his active insight and intelligence (v. 6). He is portrayed under figures that represent him as the supreme ruler with fullness of power and of knowledge, and at the same time as the supreme example of self-sacrifice and self-surrender; and that has been the avenue to his power. The Lamb is in the midst of the throne, and of the four living creatures, and in the midst of the elders (v. 6). The meaning is that the Lamb is the central figure upon whom the attention of all is fixed. The Lamb takes the book from the hand of Him that sits upon the throne, and his action is the signal for another burst of praise—a new song (v. 9)—from the four living creatures and the twenty-four elders. Again the song interprets the scene. It was because the Lamb had been slain and had purchased unto God with his blood men of every tribe (cf. 14³, 4 Mt. 20²⁸ Acts 20²⁸ 1 Cor. 6²⁰ 7²³ 1 Pet. 2⁹) that he was worthy to open the book. This song is taken up by innumerable angels around the throne; and finally all created things from every part of the universe swell the great chorus, to which the four living creatures say Amen (v. 14; cf. 1 Cor. 14¹⁶), while the elders bow in adoration.

So ends the introduction to the book: it tells of the two principles of (1) the creative power, and (2) the redemptive purpose of God, which are the moving forces in history. It has thus a special message to people who were entangled in the circumstances of the time. There is a picture of the church on earth, its temptations, failures, triumphs, rewards. There is an interpretation of the facts of history—God made the world and is redeeming man in terms of eternity. But God has been seen not only as the sovereign Creator but also as the Love which bears all the sin of the world. At the heart of God's sovereignty is redemptive, sacrificial love: in the midst of the throne is a Lamb standing as though it had been slain. In the vision of John it was such a God who alone was able to strengthen the seer's fellow Christians to bear the storm which was about to break over them (cf. Paul's triumphant conclusion in Rom. 8³¹⁻³⁹).

"Love is and was my King and Lord,

And will be, though as yet I keep Within his court on earth, and sleep
Encompass'd by his faithful guard,
And hear at times a sentinel,

Who moves about from place to place,
And whispers to the worlds of space
In the deep night, that all is well."

7. With the loosing of each seal a part of the contents of the book is disclosed, and that is the theme of the following chapters. Others think the book is a will, which according to Roman law bore the seven seals of seven witnesses and could not be executed until all the seven seals were loosed. It is more likely that the book is conceived as a roll than as a codex.

8. Read having each of them a harp and golden bowls full of incense. The words which are the prayers of the saints are a gloss and incompatible with 8³⁻⁵, where prayers and incense are not identical. Even if the words are retained, there would be no justification for interpreting the prayers of the saints as intercessions for the church in the mediæval sense. The "saints" in the N.T. are the faithful, and more often the reference is to the church militant than to the church triumphant.

9, 10. "Heaven is revealed to earth as the homeland of music," says Rossetti. The song here is to the Lamb for his redemptive work: he was slain, but at the cost of his blood he bought for God men of all nations, and they whom he has bought (not the Cæsars) are the true kings of the earth and the true priests. And they shall reign—probably the future tense is right here in accordance with Hebrew idiom, whether the present or future is read in the Greek.

12. The first four parts of the ascription—power, riches, wisdom, and might—are those which the Lamb assumes; the last three—honor, glory, blessing—mark the recognition of the Lamb by mankind. It is to be noted how John, a Jewish monotheist, equates, without hesitation, these two figures, God and the Lamb, with the highest worship—a suggestion looking in the direction of the later doctrine of the Trinity.

CHAPTER VI

The Opening of the First Six Seals. Not unlike a drama in three acts are described the visions of the Seals (ch. 6), the Trumpets (chs. 8, 9), and the Bowls (chs. 15–20³), but the orderly sequence is more than once interrupted (the so-called parentheses). The seals are the signs of the destruction of the present world. This world is the training ground for the children of God; when the training is finished the world will be destroyed. This destruction will be heralded by the disintegrating disasters such as war and pestilence (vv. 1–8). Then will follow disorders in the universe (vv. 12–17). The best interpretation is that John is following the eschatological scheme of Mk. 13 (cf. Mt. 24 Lk. 21), where, combining the three accounts, are recorded seven signs that will be seen when these things are about to be accomplished (Mk. 13⁴), wars, civil strife, famines, earthquakes, persecutions, pestilence, signs in the sun, etc. John has combined earthquakes and eclipses into the sixth woe and has changed the character of the seventh. He has changed the order, because he personifies four of the woes under the four riders, and because of the dramatic fitness by which the social disasters come first (vv. 1–4) until a certain proportion of the martyrs is obtained (vv. 9–11—the fifth seal). After that follow the disorders in the universe (the sixth seal). But the writer is not merely using this familiar apocalyptic material in a traditional way; he interprets some of the signs in reference to contemporary events. The four horsemen are suggested by Zechariah's vision (Zech. 1⁸ 61–8), but the significance has little in common with the O.T. prophet. The whole is cast in dramatic form. The visions are not read from a book but the judgments are translated into action as each seal is broken.

1–17. The Judgment of the World Through the Opening of the Seals by Christ. The imagery here is all designed to emphasize one theme—Christ the Judge of men.

1, 2. As Christ opened the first seal in response to the Come of one of the living creatures, a rider on a white horse armed with a bow to whom was given a crown went forth. Victorious War is meant, and the bow makes clear the reference to the Parthian Empire, always a nightmare to the inhabitants of the Eastern provinces of the Græco-Roman world after Crassus' defeat in 53 B.C. The cleverness of the Parthian horsemen with the bow was a byword in Roman literature after that defeat, and any thought of invasion of the empire was associated with that frontier. In v. 1 it is not certain whether the Come is addressed to the Seer, to Christ or to the rider on the white horse. The rider on the white horse has been interpreted as Christ coming forth to conquer in answer to the summons Come. In 19¹¹ he is rightly thus portrayed. Here Christ is the Lamb who sends forth the rider by opening the seal and he cannot be the rider. Besides, the woes are the precursors of the coming of Christ.

3, 4. The second seal lets loose a rider on a red horse symbolizing revolution, civil strife. Some have understood it of Rome as the destroyer of order and life, but this is less likely. This rider will take away the peace of the earth, which is not the peace of Christ.

5, 6. The third seal lets loose a rider on a black horse with a balance in his hand; and a voice, perhaps of the Lamb, speaks of the price of wheat and barley as in a time of famine, and forbids harming the olive and the vines. A ration of wheat will cost a day's wages—twelve times its normal price; the same sum will not buy enough barley for a man and his family. But the famine will not affect the luxuries, the oil and wine. Perhaps there is a reference to Domitian's edict in 92 A.D. to cut down vineyards in the provinces because of the shortage of cereals, an edict which was rescinded because of the protests against it from the cities of Asia.

7, 8. From the fourth seal issued a pale horse and its rider and his name was Death, i.e., Pestilence. The word "Death" is used as Europeans speak of the "Black Death." Authority was given to him over one quarter of the earth. Nearly always pestilence followed famine in olden times. Hades is often associated with Death in this book (cf. 20¹³, note).

9-11. The fifth seal stands for persecution. John could not follow out the symbolism of the horses and their riders by making God send forth a horse to martyr the saints. So he uses another figure to represent the persecution to which they are subject. The souls of the martyrs are represented as the blood of sacrifices flowing under the altar in heaven on which they have been offered. These pray for vengeance. Their cry goes up How long? (Cf. Ps. 78 361 Lk. 187.) When will the righteousness of God be vindicated? They are told they are to enjoy quiet for a time, until the completion of their number, till the roll of the martyrs is finished. The time will not be long. It is for John and those to whom he writes that the souls of the martyrs are waiting (cf. Heb. 11⁴⁰), but the reference here is probably not as there to the O.T. saints, but to the Christians (v. 9) whose story we read in Acts, to Antipas (2¹³), and to those massacred under Nero. But the meaning is the same, that the church militant and the church triumphant are so much one that the blessedness of the church triumphant lacks something until the church militant has become the church triumphant. These martyrs are clothed with a white robe, their spiritual resurrection body (cf. 3⁵), which John conceives as given to the righteous only (cf. 2 Cor. 5², 3).

12-17. The woes thus far described are in the past. The sixth seal reveals woes not yet fulfilled. The continuance of the world depends on the stability of the heavenly bodies; when they forsake their order the end is at hand. The O.T. descriptions of the Day of Jehovah supply the imagery (cf. Joel 2³⁰, 31 Isa. 50³ 34⁴ 21⁹ Hos. 10⁸ Ezek. 32⁷ Lk. 23³⁰). Not only the sun and moon and stars are affected, but heaven itself is described as rent in two, whereupon the divided portions curl into a roll on either side. Mankind in seven classes is described as panic-stricken. First, those who might think themselves secure by position, the kings, i.e., the heads of the heathen nations; the princes (the word means the chief men of Parthia); the captains, i.e., the Roman military tribunes; then those who trust in wealth or strength to protect them; and lastly the two classes which embrace all, every bondman and freeman. The conscience-stricken question of men, Who is able to stand? (v. 17) is answered in 7⁹—a great multitude which no man can number standing before God.

Apart from the sixth seal the judgments let loose under the others were all familiar enough in the ancient world. Wars, revolutions, famine, pestilence, persecution—these have been known in most centuries. If they are the precursors of disasters in the universe, earthquakes and the like, which were long ago foretold as the last signs of the end, men might well be utterly terrified, unless they can see a meaning in it all. This chapter shows that it is the Lamb that was slain who unlooses these forces of destruction. They must then be under his control, and even these forces must ultimately be to his glory.

CHAPTER VII

1-17. The Vision of the Triumphant Host. (The first parenthesis.) At this point there is an interlude in the unfolding drama. The first six seals have predicted judgments which increase in intensity and range. Before the seventh is revealed there is this vision which is intended to reassure the redeemed that they cannot be harmed by the plagues and disasters which are to befall the world. Always before some specially critical revelation of judgment John interposes a vision of consolation and hope. In this chapter he perceives four angels who are set over the four corners of the earth holding the winds from blowing. (The Jews considered the winds from the four corners harmful.) Here the angels represent the forces which are to bring destruction on the world. The seer is conscious of another angel rising from the east, whence the life-giving sun rises (Ezek. 43²), bidding the four angels, who are to let loose demonic woes, to hurt nothing until the servants of God have been sealed (v. 3). Hitherto the hosts of evil have been invisible, mysterious: now they are to make open war on God, who puts his mark upon his servants as temple-slaves bore the brand of the god (cf. Gal. 6¹⁷). By this they are known as the property of Jesus and no spiritual powers of darkness can hurt them (cf. Ezek. 9⁴).

Later baptism was called "a sealing," a sure protection against alien powers. Those who were thus protected were the spiritual Israel, and John uses a traditional Jewish apocalyptic number, 144,000, to signify the completeness of Israel (v. 4). It is clear they were protected from spiritual harm in the coming reign of Anti-Christ but they are not protected from martyrdom by this sealing. For in vv. 9-17 there is a second pause in the drama. The seer anticipates a later development by inserting a vision of these same sealed and now martyred Christians in heaven. The reason of this is to encourage them in their suffering by the contemplation of coming blessedness. The great host of v. 9 is the same as the 144,000 of v. 4. In vv. 1-8 the writer is influenced by his remembrance of some Jewish apocalypse, but as the vision unfolds it is no limited or racial redemption which is revealed. The representatives of the Jewish tribes have become a great multitude from all nations and tribes and peoples and tongues. These chant together a hymn of praise ascribing salvation to God and to the Lamb. The inhabitants of heaven confirm with Amen the praise of the redeemed. Who are these? One of the elders anticipates John's question and in v. 13 says that these are they who have passed through the tribulation and the fires of martyrdom. The tribulation is probably that referred to in Mk. 13¹⁹ Mt. 24²¹. It is that which is caused by the appearance of Satan on earth and the woes that arise therefrom.

2. Having the seal of the living God. Sealing is used (1) to authenticate a message, as in Jn. 6²⁷; (2) to claim ownership in the branding of slaves, as in 2 Cor. 1²² Eph. 1¹³ 4³⁰; (3) to protect on the ground of this ownership (Ex. 12²³ Ezek. 9⁴⁻⁶). It is this meaning combined with (2) which is characteristic of this book (cf. 9⁴ 13¹⁶ 14¹⁻⁵; cf. also 2¹⁷ 3¹²). The branding of slaves with the mark of the owner was familiar everywhere in the Græco-Roman world. The wearing of Tephillin—phylacteries—on the forehead as protective amulets was Jewish (cf. Deut. 6⁸). In the last resort this sealing means the outward manifestation of character (13¹⁷, note; cf. Rom. 8 and Paul's expectation of the revealing of the sons of God). This manifestation of character is completed in the spiritual body which the righteous receive after death. Every Christian has this body potential and actual: he can defile it (3⁴); he can cleanse it and make it white (7¹⁴). Actually God or Christ gives him the white garment, but in the sense that he co-operates with God it can be said they wash their garments and make them white in the blood of the Lamb (v. 14). Because the Lamb had been slain for them they had been able to endure martyrdom. In vv. 15-17 is described in simple language reminiscent of the O.T. the blessedness of these martyrs. The Christian Church has rightly seen in these verses the most comfortable assurance for all those who amid struggle and disappointment and sorrow hold fast to "the word of God and to the testimony of Jesus" (19).

5-8. The order of the tribes is inexplicable. It is suggested to rearrange vv. 5ab, 7, 8, 5c, 6: Leah's sons, Rachel's sons, Leah's handmaid's sons, Rachel's handmaid's sons. Judah is placed first, because from him is to spring Messiah. Dan is omitted because Anti-Christ is to spring from him (cf. Gen. 49¹⁷). Manasseh is substituted for Dan, though he is already included under Joseph. Another suggestion is that a scribe mistakenly wrote "Man" for "Dan," and the error was understood as an abbreviation for Manasseh.

CHAPTER VIII

1-13. The Sounding of the Seven Trumpets. (See also ch. 9.) With the seventh seal we expect the judgments to reach a climax. Instead a new series begins with the sounding of the seven trumpets. It is as if all is working up to a definite culmination but the crisis comes and passes and it is not the end. So it always is with the divine judgments; they mark an end, but they also prove a beginning. But a solemn point is here reached, for at the opening of the seventh seal the psalmody of heaven is hushed for the space of half an hour. There is tense silence that the prayers of the suffering saints on earth may be heard before God's throne. To the Seer in his vision the events of the six seals were future; to the Seer recording his vision they were of what had already happened. Now the host of heaven are aware of a vision of crises, which shall come, some of which are without any precedent. The pause in heaven is appropriate to mark the point where history ends and prophecy begins.

J. Weiss and Charles find reason to believe that vv. 7-12 are an interpolation because they are colorless repetitions of the seals and the bowls upon which they are modeled. Their diction and style are not that of John, and they conflict with the expectation created by 7⁴⁻⁸, and there are some inconsistencies in them, e.g., 8⁷, 9⁴. If this be so, there are three angels with three trumpets who herald three woes recorded in chs. 9, 12, 13. Charles reads the verses thus—1, 3-5, 2, 6, 13, etc., and translates vv. 2, 6 And I saw three angels . . . and there were given to them three trumpets . . .

and the three angels who had the three trumpets made ready to sound them. Then v. 13 simply introduces the three trumpets that follow.

3-5. The reason of the silence in heaven (v. 1) is explained. These verses give another pledge that the cause of the suffering saints is counted of supreme value in heaven. There was a belief in Judaism in the angels of heaven who sing by night only and not by day, in order that the praises of Israel may be heard by day. Here heaven is silent for another angel—Michael perhaps—to cense the prayers of the saints; i.e., to make them acceptable by offering them upon the golden altar before the throne of God. There is only one way into heaven, and it is through self-sacrifice. The souls of the martyrs are under the altar in 6^o; the prayers of the saints are here laid upon the altar so that the last taint of self may be cleansed and they may be made acceptable to God (cf. Enoch 93^f). But the angel takes up the censor for another purpose; he fills it with fire and casts it forth upon the earth. The prayers of the saints are accepted, and upon the earth are lightnings and earthquakes, a fitting prelude to v. 13, the announcements of the judgments which are to come upon the impenitent.

"Never a sigh of passion or of pity,

Never a wail for weakness or for wrong

Has not its archive in the angel's city,

Finds not its echo in the endless song."

6-12. The first four angels sound and in response four terrible calamities occur in the world of nature, but their effect is only partial. V. 7 describes a rain of hail and of fire mingled with blood. In 1901 in Italy blood-red rain fell, caused by the air being full of particles of fine red sand from the Sahara. Volcanic eruptions have produced similar phenomena elsewhere. There is a resemblance between these woes and the plagues of Egypt (cf. Ex. 9²⁴ Psa. 18¹², 13). In vv. 8, 9 a burning mountain falls into the sea, and one third of it becomes blood (cf. 163 Ex. 7¹⁷⁻²¹). In vv. 9-11 a star burning as a torch falls upon the rivers and poisons one third of them, so that men die who drink of the bitter wormwood waters. Zoroastrianism has a story of the great star Gocihar falling on the earth. In v. 12 the light of the sun and moon and stars is diminished by one third (cf. Ex. 10²¹⁻²³). The destruction of one third of the sun would not shorten the day by one third. Probably with one MS. we should read for the last phrase of v. 12 and the third part of them did not shine by day nor likewise by night.

13. An eagle is seen flying in mid heaven, i.e., where he can be seen and heard by all.

An eagle was a familiar messenger of doom. This is a last warning to the world before the angels sound the other trumpets. The three-times repeated woe corresponds to the three-fold judgment to follow, two parts of which are referred to in 9¹² and 11¹⁴.

CHAPTER IX

1-12. The Fifth Trumpet: The First Woe, the Locusts. The star which John sees fallen to the earth is an angel, who had descended with authority to open the abyss (cf. Enoch 86¹ 88¹). The abyss is the place of punishment for fallen angels and the Beast during the Messianic kingdom. The final place of punishment is the lake of fire and brimstone (20¹⁵). Originally the abyss was the ocean, which was shut up in a subterranean depth: but in later thought it stood for the chasm in the earth where the wicked are punished (cf. Enoch 88¹). The angel opens the pit, and a cloud of smoke issues from it, darkening the sun. Then out of the smoke locusts came forth. Perhaps the meaning is that what looked like smoke proved to be a cloud of locusts. The description of the locusts begins with a phrase from Joel 22-11, but these are not the destructive pest with which he was familiar. The description shows them to be infernal locusts, which hurt not the grass or the trees but men. Locusts commonly live for five months, and these are to torment men for that period. Their time is defined; they do not come independently of the divine plan. They come as an army under a king who is called in Hebrew Abaddon, i.e., destruction (v. 11). The Greek equivalent, it is said here, is Apollyon. There may be a reference to the Greek god Apollo, of whose cult the locust was a symbol. These locusts were allowed to hurt only the men who were unsealed (cf. 7^{4f}). The mark which God set upon the faithful will therefore be manifest—they will be revealed in their true form as the sons of God; their character will be clearly seen over against the assaults of evil. The locusts do not kill; they torment. Really they are demonic powers, which resemble locusts, though they have human faces, women's hair, lions' teeth and scorpions' tails (vv. 7-10). This is described as the First Woe.

13-21. The Sixth Trumpet: The Second Woe, the Demonic Horsemen. The Seer hears the command to loose the four angels at the Euphrates. This voice comes from the horns of the altar where the prayers of the martyrs were censed (8³), and is in answer to those prayers. The angels are not the four mentioned in 7¹, for they are at the four corners of the earth. But these are the agents of the wrath of God and their mission is to destroy one third of mankind (v. 15). In the description two ideas are blended. They are fire breathing monsters, a trait of mythology; and they are squadrons of cavalry, twice ten thousand times ten thousand. This is due to the fact that on the Euphrates lay the border provinces between Parthia and the Romans, and from there Rome always feared some destructive agency. As in the case of the locusts it is some calamity which men had learned to dread, which is heightened by the conversion of the locusts into demonic agencies, so here the picture of an invasion by a Parthian army is developed into one of demonic horsemen breathing fire and smoke and brimstone. These awful demon hosts destroy one third of mankind. Both the locusts and the horsemen are messengers of punishment upon the heathen world, but the survivors of that world did not repent (v. 20).

The two visions of the locusts and the demon horsemen can only be understood by reference to the universal belief in the ancient world that the very air men breathed was full of spiritual powers of darkness which were continually at war with God and with his people. The Jews believed in the existence of these evil spirits much as did the heathen. They were regarded as fallen angels or as demigods (cf. Gen. 61. 2 Secrets of Enoch 201). For Paul's belief see 2 Cor. 44 Eph. 22 612 Col. 220 Gal. 43. 9. It was the glory of the gospel that Christ triumphed over these demon agencies, and set free those who were his, so that no demons any longer had power to harm them. The fact that this world of demonology is for us of merely mythological interest shows how true was the Christian claim for the victory of Christ. (See Glover, Jesus in the Experience of Men, pp. 1-17.) The two facts which are of most significance here are that these demons are under the authority of Christ, and that they have no power to hurt those who are sealed with his name on their foreheads. Every missionary who has seen men and women haunted by superstitious fears under the power of demon-worship testifies to the reality of the deliverance from these supernatural fears which Christ still brings. But the Seer knows that even these revelations of supernatural judgments will not cause men to repent (vv. 20, 21). Dire calamities are recognized as the judgment of God upon great moral evils by those who can read him upon every page of history. But those who know him not are terrified, but not unto repentance (cf. Rom. 120, 29). It is to be noted that these judgments heralded by the trumpets fall upon the world. The faithful will suffer from the first four, which are physical, but against the fifth and sixth, which are demonic woes, they are protected. To the faithful these are a part of the discipline of life, discipline administered by their heavenly Father, but they are not sent in judgment (cf. Rom. 828).

19. The reference to the tails may be a reference to the skill of the Parthian horsemen in shooting their arrows as they fled from the enemy.

CHAPTER X

1-11. The Vision of the Strong Angel with the Little Book. (This forms, with ch. 11, the second parenthesis.) As after the opening of the sixth seal, so here at the end of the sixth trumpet there is a pause; the climax is again postponed. Ch. 10 is designed (1) to show that the hour prayed for by the martyrs (69) when God's purposes will be fulfilled has come; (2) to serve as an introduction to the little book (111-13). The Seer is on earth and sees a strong angel descending from heaven—Gabriel, perhaps, whose name suggests strength. He is described in terms which recall 115, so that some scholars understand Christ himself to be meant. But it is far more likely that the angel is so described to represent the covenant mercy—the rainbow upon his head (cf. Gen. 914-17)—and the invincible power of the Lord whose messenger he is. When this angel spoke, the seven thunders uttered their voice (v. 4). The seven thunders mean another series of judgments similar to those connected with the seals and the trumpets. The Seer is bidden to seal, i.e., not to reveal the message which came to him in those seven thunders (cf. Paul's vision of the things he could not utter, 2 Cor. 124). The strong angel, who stands partly on the sea and partly on the earth, has in his hand a little book (v. 2). He swears solemnly that there will be no more delay (v. 6, R.V. mg., not as text). That means that the hour for the reign of the Anti-Christ has all but struck. This is the third Woe, recounted in ch. 12. At the sound of the trumpet of the seventh angel the mystery of God (v. 7), i.e., the whole purpose of God in regard to the world, the purpose which was declared to the prophets (cf. Gal. 318), is finished. The Seer hears again the voice from heaven bidding him take the little book which the angel has in his hand. He eats the little book (cf. Ezek. 29-33), finding it sweet in his mouth and bitter in the belly (v. 10). The taste of the book means that the contents were mercy and redemption, disappointment and destruction. The eating of it symbolizes the renewal of the inspiration to prophecy concerning many peoples and nations and tongues and kings (v. 11; cf. Acts 9:15).

6. That there shall be time no longer. If this is correct, the meaning is that time shall be abolished and eternity begin (cf. Secrets of Enoch 33²). But more likely the marginal rendering delay (adopted in text of A.S.V.) is right, i.e., the time of waiting is at an end.

CHAPTER XI

Contents of the Little Book. In vv. 1–13 John has embodied one or probably two fragments of Jewish apocalypses and has adapted them to his own purpose, which is to emphasize his main theme, that loyalty to Christ insures security against the assaults of spiritual powers of darkness, and though that loyalty entails martyrdom, it brings ultimate victory in all things. The chief reasons for the supposition that he is here adapting earlier sources are (1) literary—the style and idiom are different from those of the rest of the book; (2) historical—the difficulty of date. These verses suppose the Temple is still standing; i.e., they were written before 70 A.D. Note that the Temple in these verses means the Temple in Jerusalem: elsewhere in this book it means the temple in heaven (cf. 7:15 11:19).

1, 2. The Temple to be Measured—Its Meaning. These verses describe the measuring of the Temple, the altar and the worshipers. But the outer court is left unmeasured: it is given over to the Gentiles; this and the Holy City are to be trodden under foot for three and a half years (cf. Lk. 21:24). The Zealots occupied the inner court of the Temple when the Romans captured the outer court in the great siege in 70 A.D. John uses in these two verses a fragment from some Zealot's writing prophesying that the Temple would not be destroyed. The Zealot wrote of the Temple in Jerusalem; the measuring denoted in his writing the preservation of the sacred building. John understands all symbolically. The outer court represents to him the unbelievers given over to Anti-Christ, the conflict with whom is shortly described. The measuring denotes the preservation of the faithful from spiritual harm. Temple, altar and worshipers in John's interpretation stand for the Christian community of God. Elsewhere John uses the holy city only for the new Jerusalem (21:2, etc.); the earthly Jerusalem is Sodom (11:8). Here he is using it in the sense in which the Zealot used it, in a prophecy of the destruction of the city and the safety of the Temple. The forty-two months are from Dan. 7:25 12:7—three and a half years. That was the actual duration of the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, 168–165 B.C., and is regarded as typical of the duration of the persecution under the Anti-Christ. Possibly the fact that it was half of seven, the perfect number, may have helped to make the number traditional.

3–13. The Prophecy of the Two Witnesses. This is a fragment from another apocalyptic writing adapted by John. It is based on Zech. 4:2, 3, 14. During the same three and a half years that Jerusalem is to be trodden under foot, two witnesses (cf. Mal. 4:5) are to prophesy, clothed in sackcloth. They are identified with the two olive trees and two candlesticks in Zechariah's vision (v. 4). But there the olive trees feed the lamps, and represent the heads of the church and state, Joshua and Zerubabel. Here the olive trees represent Moses and Elijah, the Law and the Prophets. The testimony of these two witnesses will be authenticated by wonderful signs and miracles (v. 6), but when they shall have finished their testimony they will be overcome by the Beast from the abyss, and lie dead in the streets of Jerusalem (v. 7). Their enemies rejoice for three days and a half, but then the breath of life returns into the dead bodies (cf. Ezek. 37:10) and they arise and are summoned to heaven, to the consternation of their enemies who see them (vv. 9–11). A great earthquake follows causing the tenth part of the city to fall and the death of seven thousand persons. The earthquake is common in apocalyptic (Joel 2:10 3:16 Zech. 14:4). The rest are afraid and glorify God (v. 13). According to Josephus, Siloam and other springs almost dried up before the coming of Titus against Jerusalem and after his coming flowed again abundantly.

These two fragments of Jewish apocalyptic, which clearly belong to the period before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D., are used by John to prepare his readers for the prophecy of the appearance of Anti-Christ. Anti-Christ is traditionally associated with Jerusalem, and though John associates him with Rome, he here uses the earlier conception which relates to Jerusalem, though Jerusalem was no longer in existence when he was writing. As always, he adapts that which he borrows. The destruction of Jerusalem was a fulfillment of the earlier prophecy. God's witnesses had been killed, even the greatest of them all, for he adds his own description of Jerusalem as the place where their Lord was crucified (v. 8). If there is a more terrible manifestation of Anti-Christ threatening his readers, John would remind them that beyond death is resurrection and triumph. Note the tenses in vv. 11–13. They are past but they represent the future of prophetic certainty, for that which shall be is as sure as that which has been, because it has been determined by God.

14-19. The Prophecy of the Third Woe Herald by the Seventh Trumpet. Here is resumed the unfolding of the drama from the point where the author digressed, 10¹. In the order of action 11¹⁴ follows 9²¹. The final crisis is not yet ushered in, however; but, as in 8¹, this passage prepares the reader for a new cycle of visions. The third and last woe is heralded in by the trumpet of the seventh angel followed by two songs in heaven. No silence follows the sounding of the seventh trumpet as followed the opening of the seventh seal (8¹), but the sound of voices is raised in a pæan of victory. The Woe (chs. 12, 13) apparently results in the triumph of Satan and the overthrow of the church. But these two songs which precede it show that the real result is the coming of Christ and the establishment of his kingdom. The tense is that of prophetic certainty—the kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord (ch. 15), though all is in the future. But there is no more doubt about the future than about the past if God has determined it. The song of the elders (cf. 4⁴) celebrates the coming of the Kingdom, the Last Judgment, and the final reward of the servants of God.

18. Charles rearranges the order of the clauses thus: And the nations have waxed wrath, and thy wrath has come and the time to destroy them that destroy the earth (i.e., the Beast, the False Prophet and their followers), the small and the great, and the time for the dead to be judged, and [the time] for the giving of their reward to thy servants the prophets, and the saints and them that fear thy name.

19. The temple of God in heaven is opened. As the first two Woes were connected with the heavenly altar (8³ 9¹³), this third Woe is connected with the ark. The earthly ark was a witness of God's covenant with Israel. The ark is here revealed in the temple in heaven to witness to the covenant between God and the spiritual, the true Israel, i.e., the Christian Church. The showing of the ark of the covenant is associated with the revelation of God's presence in the midst of the convulsions in the natural world (cf. 8⁵ 16¹⁸) such as happened on Sinai. Jewish tradition believed that the ark was carried to a place of safety by Jeremiah and would reappear when the Messiah came (2 Mace. 21-8 2 Baruch 67-10).

CHAPTER XII

1-17. The Vision of the Woman, the Man-Child and the Dragon. To understand this chapter it must be recognized that every mystic uses in his visions theological material already familiar, which he shares in common with those who belong to his age and world of thought. This material is refashioned in his ecstatic vision, and the result may not always be self-consistent when he tries to put into words the truth of which he has been made aware when in the spirit. The theological material behind this vision is a primitive myth of the conflict between light and darkness, order and disorder, under the figure of a child, born of a sun-goddess, persecuted by a dragon, the latter being finally overthrown. This had been spiritualized into an allegory of the religious history of the Jews and their expectation of a Saviour. John freely uses this, allegorizing in his own way the mythological features.

1-6. A woman arrayed with the sun is about to give birth to a son. A red dragon stands ready to devour the child when he is born. The child is caught up to God and the woman flees to a place in the wilderness prepared by God for her.

In the original myth, which was pagan and has elements derived from the mythologies of Babylon, Egypt and Greece, the woman was a goddess, clothed with the sun, with her feet on the moon as a footstool, and her crown studded with the signs of the zodiac. This description John follows, but it has no special significance for him. In its Jewish form the story represented the expected birth of the Messiah from the Jewish Church. John has adapted this to the birth of Christ. The woman is therefore the true Israel. In the O.T. the spiritual Israel is the spouse of God; in this book elsewhere the Bride of Christ (cf. ch. 21).

3. The seven-headed dragon is familiar in Babylonian mythology, the chaos monster. We should expect seven horns. The ten may be a reference to Dan. 7⁷. 24. Perhaps the seven diadems are due to the fact that Christ has many diadems and his great foe likewise. Or the reference may be to the kings through whom the dragon's power is exercised. The tail of the dragon casting the stars to earth (v. 4) was originally the explanation of falling stars or other phenomena in the heavens, but in the Jewish form of the myth it refers to the war in heaven, by which Satan is cast down to earth where the woman is. The child is the Christ. The power of darkness cannot destroy him, for he is caught up to God (v. 5). Only his birth and ascension are mentioned—neither his life nor death. But the point is that the dragon is foiled in his attack upon the woman.

6. The church is to be protected during the reign of the Anti-Christ, the period of twelve hundred and sixty days (see notes on 112. 3). This verse anticipates v. 14 and may be out of its true order.

7-12. An episode prior in time to vv. 1-6 and explanatory of them. There had been war in heaven, and Michael and his angels had prevailed, and hurled Satan down to earth (cf. Isa. 14¹² Lk. 10¹⁸ Jn. 12³¹). But with this event in the past is blended a song of triumph in heaven, proclaiming the victory of the faithful over the dragon through the blood of the Lamb and the witness of the faithful to it (v. 11), and their readiness to lose their life in order to save it (cf. Lk. 14²⁶ Jn. 12²⁵). Heaven may well rejoice; though the advent of the dragon means woe for the earth, it is only for the time.

7. The Greek here represents a Hebrew idiom. Read there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels had to fight with the dragon. Michael was the patron angel of Israel and so of the true Israel of God (cf. Dan. 10¹³, 21 12¹). There were two traditions about Satan: one that he had been hurled from heaven at the beginning (cf. Secrets of Enoch 29⁴, 5), the other that he had his place in heaven in historic times (cf. Job 1⁶, 7). This led to the belief that Satan's overthrow from heaven is the first of the last great struggles between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan. The fact that he has been cast down from heaven (v. 9) means that evil is already defeated, the most important and first stage in Satan's conquest has been already achieved (Lk. 10¹⁸ Jn. 12³¹). The dragon and the serpent and Satan are all identical here. Originally the serpent was a dragon hostile to God and man—Satan was one of God's vice-regents whose duty it was to act the part of a public prosecutor (cf. Zech. 3¹, 2) or of a heavenly detective (Job 1⁶⁻²¹⁰). Gradually the idea of the tempter and enemy of man developed, partly through Persian influence (1 Chr. 21¹), and in the N.T. it is complete.

13-17. The myth of the dragon and the woman is resumed. The dragon persecutes the woman after her child is caught up to heaven. She is given the two wings of an eagle to escape into the wilderness, where she is nourished for three and a half years. The dragon casts a river of water out of his mouth to destroy her, but the earth swallows it, and the dragon goes away to war with the rest of her children who are faithful to God (v. 17). The reference to the eagle (v. 14) probably belongs to the original myth and has no special significance here. In vv. 14-16 the reference may be to the fact that some of the Jews fled to Jabneh and the Christians to Pella before the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D.

(cf. Mt. 24¹⁶). But elsewhere John anticipates the universal martyrdom of the faithful before the final overthrow of Satan.

The "truth embodied in a tale" is that the conflict between good and evil did not originate on earth but in heaven—a very ancient belief. The disorder of this world is only a part of the disorder which affects the whole spiritual world. The final issue does not depend upon the result of the conflict on this earth. Already the battle has been won in heaven. God's sovereignty has been vindicated. Satan has been hurled to earth. That means an increase in the malignity of evil forces here, an apparent victory of Satan, which will involve the universal martyrdom of the saints. But in reality it is Satan's last struggle: he has been decisively beaten: his time of seeming triumph is short. Those who are faithful to the end will realize the victory on earth, which has been already won in heaven.

CHAPTER XIII

The Visions of Two Beasts. In this chapter John is making use of two earlier and probably Hebrew writings—one referring to the Roman Empire as Anti-Christ (vv. 1-10); and the other to some power which would claim the prerogative of Deity and require men to worship him (vv. 11-18), a conception of Anti-Christ akin to that in 2 Thess. 2¹⁻¹². John uses these sources freely and interprets them in his own way (see opening paragraph under ch. 12).

1-10. The Vision of the Beast with the Ten Horns. V. 1a need not be separated from the words that follow, as in R.V., nor is the variant reading, and I stood upon the shore of the sea, to be preferred. The dragon standing on the shore summons a beast from the sea. Doubtless the Mediterranean Sea is meant. The Jews always feared the sea, all the more in this century because to face the Mediterranean was to have the Roman Empire before one's eyes. The beast is a terrifying monster whom the whole earth worships (v. 4). He makes war upon the saints, and it is given to him to overcome them, so that all worship him except those whose names are inscribed in the Lamb's book of life (v. 8). The beast is the Roman Empire; the conception is based on Dan. 7²⁻⁷, where the fourth kingdom, by which was meant the empire of Alexander and his successors, was in N.T. times universally interpreted of the Roman Empire (cf. Lk. 21²⁰). The horns and heads correspond with Daniel's conception and doubtless represent Roman emperors. The ten diadems (v. 1) are peculiar to this vision. The names of blasphemy means the title of divine authority (Sebastos) which the emperors arrogated to themselves. The immediate cause of the persecution, which this foretells, is the refusal of the faithful to acknowledge such claims. For the leopard, the bear, and the lion in v. 2 cf. Dan. 7. The meaning is that the Roman Empire united in itself the qualities of the other empires. One of the heads of the beast is represented as though it had been slain unto death, but the death stroke was healed (v. 3). The same word slain is used of the Lamb in v. 5, and shows that the beast is the counterpart of Christ, i.e., the Anti-Christ. Slain as it were unto death means slain and restored to life. So the reference is to a Roman emperor, in whom the power of Satan was personified on earth, who was slain but came to life again. Nero is the emperor as understood in the Nero redivivus myth. In his death and in his return to life the Anti-Christ is a diabolical counterpart of Christ. So the worship offered to him is a mockery of the worship due to Christ. And his empire is to be universal (v. 7) for a time. Satan was the antagonist of Christ in heaven. Rome represents Satan on earth; Nero is the personification of the Roman power, i.e., of Satan. He is the devil's Messiah—the Anti-Christ. The power of Rome is the power of Satan (v. 4), not moral power but brute force. This power wins the allegiance of all whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life (cf. 3⁵ 21²⁷). The world is amazed at the power of the beast and gives him the worship he claims. Worshiping the beast is worshiping the devil, whose representative he is. It is possible to take the words from the foundation of the world (v. 8) with were written—a reference to predestination (cf. 17⁸ Mt. 25³⁴ Eph. 14), but they may be taken with the Lamb that hath been slain (cf. 5⁶). As Moses had been ordained mediator of the covenant from the foundation of the world, so Christ was ordained as Redeemer from the beginning of things. There was a cross in the heart of God before there was one on Calvary (cf. 1 Pet. 1¹⁹, 20). Love and sacrifice are at the heart of God's sovereignty. The Seer concludes that loyal endurance will win through in the coming persecution (vv. 9, 10). But even those whose names are written in the Lamb's book of life must endure martyrdom. By recognizing even the pain of martyrdom as the will of God for them the saints show their patience and prove their faith.

5. Forty-two months, cf. 11² note.

6. His tabernacle cannot mean the earthly Temple. Perhaps heaven is meant but more likely his Shekinah, his glory. Them that dwell (tabernacle) in heaven are the angels.

Others see here a reference to the attempt of Caligula to set up his statue in the Temple, an attempt which was frustrated only by his death in 41 A.D.

rob. Read if any man is to be slain with the sword, with the sword must he be slain.

11-18. The Vision of the Second Beast.

The second ally of Satan is the second beast, also called the False Prophet in 16¹³ 19²⁰ 20¹⁰. The devil is the symbol of material power divorced from morality, and as such he gives power to the beast, i.e., the Roman Empire (v. 4); he is also the father of lies (Jn. 8⁴⁴), and he appropriately calls the False Prophet to his aid. Christian thought had conceived of a False Prophet. Among the Jews the Anti-Christ was to be such. This explains the Seer's identification of the second beast with the Anti-Christ myth here. This beast has two horns like a lamb: he exercises the authority of the first beast, and does wonderful miracles, making an image of the first beast breathe and speak (vv. 14, 15). Those who will not worship the image he puts to death (cf. 2¹³). Those who do worship it are marked with the number of the beast, and those who are not so marked are liable to a sort of commercial boycott (vv. 16, 17). In appearance this beast is less fearsome than the first, but that is in keeping with its identification with the False Prophet. Our Lord had spoken of "false prophets in sheep's clothing" who "within are ravening wolves" (Mt. 7¹⁵). This second beast represents the imperial priesthood and Roman officials generally in the provinces, who compelled all men to worship the emperors, and who performed lying and magic wonders in that service, and who put to death all who refused such worship. The two horns (v. 1) may be a reference to the headdress worn by the priests. Pliny's famous letter to Trajan testifies that the alternatives were emperor worship or death.

The faithful who have the mark of the Lamb on their foreheads suffer martyrdom. Those who worship the beast are likewise marked on their right hand or forehead (v. 17). Probably the writer has in mind the custom of the orthodox Jew who wore Tephillin—phylacteries—on his left hand or head (7², note). What underlies the wearing of the mark here is belief in supernatural protection. In the broader sense the mark witnesses to the finality of character. Other interpretations of the marks relate them to (1) the branding of slaves; (2) the branding of soldiers with the name of their general; (3) seals stamped with the name of the emperor affixed to legal documents, or coins bearing his image. We know that in later times certificates were issued to those who fulfilled the regulations about the emperor-worship. Perhaps something of this sort is referred to here. The local authorities issue certificates of loyalty to the state religion. Those who were not openly Christians were by this means hunted out and prevented from earning a living (v. 17).

18. John here gives a further clue to the identity of the beast, by which men of understanding can perceive his meaning. The mark on the right hand or forehead of those who worship the beast is the number of the beast. It is the number of a man and it is six hundred and sixty-six. It is clear some individual, who would be recognized by his readers, is meant. Already reasons have been given for believing the beast represents Nero. If Neron Cæsar be written in Hebrew and the letters be given their numerical values, the total is six hundred and sixty-six. If the final N of the Greek spelling be dropped and the Latin form Nero be used, the total value is six hundred and sixteen. This is a variant reading found in some MSS. in this verse. This interpretation is therefore satisfactory from several points of view. Among other explanations one that was made at the end of the second century A.D. has been accepted by some modern scholars, that the threefold six suggests a continual falling short of the perfect number, seven. It is a summary of the apostasy that has taken place during the last six thousand years, according to Irenæus. In Marcus the Valentinian, and in the Sibylline Oracles, the number eight hundred and eighty-eight represents Christ. That is the total numerical value of Jesus in Greek letters, and suggests that he is beyond perfection. Perhaps the sea-dragon of mythology was in some way connected with the number six hundred and sixty-six, and John here asserts that this number fits a man also. The word "Cæsar" has to be written defectively in Hebrew to make the total correct, but this is not without parallel. John may mean that the mythological beast has become incarnate in a man. It is not unlikely that he had some older use of the cryptic number in mind, when he used it of Nero here, recognizing that whatever sinister associations it had were appropriately summed up in the conception of him as Anti-Christ.

The meaning is unmistakable. Rome and the cult of the emperor are the enemies of the church on earth. In them the heavenly war between Satan and Christ is palpable and incarnate. In one way or another, every Christian is faced with the challenge—emperor-worship or persecution, the service of Satan or of Christ. In the ordinary business of every day the implications of the choice are made clear (v. 17). There can be no hesitation or compromise. The application of his vision is appropriate to many other expressions of the blasphemous spirit, which was shown in the imperial cult of ancient Rome. We may legitimately see an application in events in history without supposing that John had these in his mind when he wrote. Whenever the church or the state has usurped the place of God, and claimed unquestioning authority over the consciences of men, the same spirit of Anti-Christ has been manifested, and the same duty of unhesitating opposition is demanded from the servants of Christ. In the mediæval church, with its encouragement of idolatry, its use of material power and the blasphemous claims of its Popes, the same spirit was at work. In our own time, without the claim of the unlimited authority of the state to obedience, the World War of 1914-1918 would hardly have been possible. More insidiously, but no less mischievously, the idols of the market place and of the forum, the tyranny of social and political customs claim obedience from men to-day, and in the blurring of the distinctions between the church and the world the warning of John to recognize that there can be no compromise is all the more necessary.

Perhaps 14^{12, 13} should follow here as the end of this chapter. See notes thereon.

CHAPTER XIV

Two Visions of the Church Triumphant on Earth, and of the Judgment of Rome. (The third parenthesis.) The last chapter spoke of the universal martyrdom of the faithful; this chapter is a third interlude breaking the sequence of the visions with a picture of a later stage, in order to encourage the saints to be faithful. It describes the glory of the martyrs in the Messianic kingdom (cf. 7⁹⁻¹⁷); the doom of Rome and of the heathen nations. It forms a general introduction to 16¹⁷⁻²⁰10.

1-5. Vision of the Lamb on Mount Zion, and Round Him the 144,000. (Cf. 74-8.) The number 144,000 suggests that the writer is using a Jewish prophecy, which has been transformed in most respects in his Christian experience. In the details of the vision there are striking contrasts with some of the details in the visions of the dragon and the beasts (chs. 12, 13). The worshipers of the dragon were marked on the right hand and on the forehead with the number of the Beast. So the redeemed host has the name of the Father upon the forehead. The blasphemous song Who is like unto the Beast? of 13⁴ is answered by the anthem from heaven of 14². This heavenly anthem is like the thunder of waves breaking on the shore (cf. 115 61 196 2 Esdras 617); it is a song sung by angel choirs which only the redeemed could learn (v. 3). For it is a song of the spirit, and they only through the travail and tears of earth have won spiritual understanding. In v. 4 these 144,000 are called the first-fruits, but the Greek word is better translated sacrifice, as often in the LXX. Perhaps the editor who understood it as first-fruits added the phrase which describes them all as celibates. These words (v. 4a) should be excised. The number of the redeemed certainly includes men and women, and nowhere else does the writer emphasize the ascetic view of marriage as sin which v. 4a seems to imply. It is possible that by the word virgins (which is masculine here) he only intends to emphasize the purity of the redeemed (cf. 714), following the figure of speech so common in the O.T., by which idolatry is described as fornication. But it is more likely that these words are a marginal comment added by some ascetic scribe and have wrongly crept into the text. This is the more probable because the purity of the redeemed is emphasized in v. 5 (cf. Psa. 322 Isa. 539). It is because they were like a lamb without blemish that they were fit to be offered in sacrifice to God (cf. Col. 122 1 Pet. 119 Jude v. 24). In 611 the martyrs, whose souls were beneath the altar, were seen as waiting there till their number was complete. Here the number is complete, and as in life they followed the Lamb to death, so now they follow him wherever he goes.

So once again John summons the faithful to withstand the temptation to give up the struggle by picturing the ultimate triumph of Christ and of all who are his. John thought the end would come before the generation to whom he was writing had passed away. It has not come yet, but still his vision of the assurance of ultimate victory never fails to encourage men to "hold fast that which is good" (1 Thess. 521) despite the seeming contradiction of things.

6, 7. The Vision of the Angel with the Eternal Gospel. John sees another angel going forth to evangelize the world. The appeal is to the universal impulse of man to worship the Creator (cf. the urgent call of Paul to the men of Lystra, Acts 1415). This appeal is to be contrasted with the imperial decrees to worship the emperor.

8. The Vision of the Doom of Rome (Babylon the Great). (Cf. 1617-1824.) Babylon is typical of the enemies of Israel, and John naturally uses the name to designate the foe of the true Israel, the Christian Church, finding in the prophet's words phrases which are most suitable for his present purpose (cf. Isa. 219 Jer. 517. 8). The wine of the wrath of her fornication is to be explained as a combination of two ideas, the wine of her fornication, i.e., the intoxicating and corrupting influence of Rome, and the wine of God's wrath (cf. 186).

9-11. Announcement of the Punishment for the Worshipers of the Beast. In 1316, 17 there is a proclamation of the boycotting of those who have not the mark of the Beast. V. 9 is an answer to that, a proclamation of the doom of those that have that mark. The description of the punishment meted out is reminiscent of Isa. 348-10, which tells of the doom of Edom. Features from the description of the doom of Sodom, and the punishment of Edom, and the undying fires of the valley of Hinnom, are all blended here. If material and physical punishment was in the mind of John, his picture may remind us of the consuming terrors of remorse.

12, 13. The Patience of the Saints. The Blessedness of Those Who Die in the Lord. These verses seem out of place here; they fit admirably after 1318. While all men are capable of exhibitions of self-sacrifice, such as are seen on the battlefield in those from whom it is least expected, sustained, persistent faithfulness—patience—in face of unceasing persecution is that which marks out the saints. In such a conflict the saints need strong consolation; God in his mercy gives it (v. 13). Faithfulness demands something of the martyr's courage in all ages. There have been living martyrdoms which have not ended in either a quick or a violent death. In the O.T. salvation depends upon the number of good over evil works. Here the good works which accompany the righteous souls are rather the revelation of lives redeemed by Christ. The word labors suggests the weariness of toil. That will end for the redeemed at death. But their works, i.e., their acquired capacities, the results of all their labors, the characters which those labors have helped to form, these go on into fuller development (cf. Mt. 2534-40). So Milton writes:

"Thy works and alms and all thy good endeavor [trod,
Stayed not behind nor in the grave were
But, as Faith pointed with her golden rod,
Followed thee up to joy and bliss for ever."

Heaven is freedom from the weariness of toil but work is there. Only all work is worship, because all will be undertaken for the glory of God and in his service in

". . . those great offices that suit
The full-grown energies of heaven."

Swete aptly says that this beatitude—blessed are the dead which die in the Lord—needed a voice from heaven to proclaim it.

14–20. A Vision of Judgment on the Heathen Nations. This is described fully in 19¹¹⁻¹⁶. The judgment here is represented as the harvest and vintage of the world (cf. Joel 3¹³). The double picture of the reaping of the corn and the treading of the grapes is an example of Hebrew parallelism (but see below on vv. 15–17), and is not to be understood as the gathering of the saints and the destruction of the wicked (cf. Isa. 63¹⁻⁶ Rev. 19^{13, 15}). In Dan. 7¹³ one like unto a son of man means the saints of the Most High (but cf. notes there). In apocalypses men are symbolized by beasts; angels and supernatural beings by men. So in Daniel the passage means that the faithful remnant of Israel is to be transformed into supernatural beings. The author of the book of Enoch interprets one like to a son of man of an individual, the Messiah, and so it is used in the Gospels by our Lord himself. The supernatural claim he made was in the revelation of the Father which he showed in his sinless and redemptive life, death, and resurrection. Here the one like unto the Son of man must mean an angel unless the text is corrupt. Then the agents of judgment are all angels, though later the judgment is in the hands of Christ (19¹⁵).

15–17. Charles excises these verses as a doublet of vv. 14, 18, 20. He thinks that the Son of man is Christ who has the sickle in his hand. The number of martyrs is complete, and their prayer from beneath the altar can be fulfilled, so the angel, who has to do with the souls of the martyrs beneath the altar, carries the command to the Son of man to thrust in the sickle and reap the vintage, i.e., to execute judgment. If Charles is right, the confusion in the text has caused the angel to be put for the son of man in v. 19.

20. The city is probably Jerusalem, for Jewish tradition associated the neighborhood of Jerusalem with the judgment of the Gentiles (cf. Zech. 14⁴). The measure sixteen hundred furlongs may be meant to suggest the completeness of the slaughter.

CHAPTER XV

The Preparation for the Vision of the Bowls. The development of the drama was halted at 13¹⁸, and John looked forward, anticipating the future in its final triumph of Christ (ch. 14). Now he resumes from the end of ch. 13. The entire description of the third series of judgments, now beginning, extends from 15¹ to 20³.

1. Seven Angels Having Seven Plagues.

This is the subject of the new vision.

2–4. A Vision of the Redeemed; Their Song. John describes a vision of the entire martyr host praising God for his power and righteousness and kingship of the nations. It may be that the form of that vision owes something to some experience in Patmos, where John may have watched the sun set in the Aegean, and felt himself on the shore of a glassy sea, and seen a great host who had come out of great tribulation. Such a vision would remind him of the deliverance of the Israelites at the Red Sea and the Song of Moses (Ex. 15²⁻¹⁹), though there is no reference to that song in what follows. The theme of the song here is the vision of God and his works in which thoughts of self are wholly forgotten. This scene, before the outpouring of the bowls, where the praises of the redeemed are offered to God, is similar to the scene in 8³⁻⁵, where their praises are offered to God before the sounding of the trumpets.

5–8. The Vision of the Seven Angels. These came out from the temple, i.e., the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven, clothed in linen (R.V. mg.). They had the seven bowls of God's wrath in their hands. The temple is seen filled with smoke as Isaiah saw it in his vision of a thrice holy God (Isa. 6⁴). The smoke does not here represent the incense of worship, but is the symbol of God's holiness in contact with man's sin. That holiness is about to blaze forth in fire to consume the wicked. This divine glory and power fill the temple, so that no one can enter the temple, i.e., avert by prayer the judgment before it is executed.

CHAPTER XVI

1–21. The Contents of the Seven Bowls—the Plagues. These plagues affect only the heathen world, for the Christians who had been sealed have already been martyred. This is the distinguishing feature of these plagues over against the woes heralded by the seven trumpets. These judgments have all to do with the Roman Empire as punishment for her emperor-worship and persecution of the Christians.

2. The first plague—grievous sores upon men—recalls the Egyptian plague (Ex. 9^{10, 11} Deut. 28³⁵). Its incidence is on the adherents of the Roman Empire, the men who had the mark of the Beast and worshiped his image.

3. The second plague—the sea turned into blood and the death of all animal life—recalls the first Egyptian plague (Ex. 7¹⁷⁻²¹), but there the Nile only is smitten.

4–7. The third plague turns the rivers into blood. This is regarded as peculiarly appropriate because Rome had poured out the blood of the martyrs.

8, 9. The fourth plague is scorching heat. But, as in the case of the sixth trumpet (921), the wicked do not recognize the hand of God in these torments.

10, 11. The fifth plague brings darkness upon the throne of the Beast, i.e., Rome (cf. Ex. 1021-23). As only the faithful were the victims of the fifth seal (69), so only the followers of the Beast are affected by the fifth plague. Perhaps the darkness of the kingdom is to be interpreted from the Woe described in 92f., when the smoke from the abyss darkened the sun, and demonic locusts tormented men, so that they longed for death.

12-16. The sixth plague. In the Woe in 913-21 monstrous horsemen who are really demons appear. Here the Euphrates, the natural barrier between East and West, is dried up, so that the Parthian kings under Nero redivivus may attack Rome, the throne of the Beast. Thus his kingdom is divided against itself. Rome calls to her help three unclean spirits (cf. 1 Tim. 41 1 Jn. 43)—Satan, the Beast and the False Prophet, i.e., the second Beast. They are described as like frogs, which in the Zend religion are the cause of plagues and death. These unclean spirits gather the nations together to war. This war is the decisive conflict of God with Rome (v. 14). The scene is to be the battlefield of Israel. At Megiddo, Deborah and Barak had overthrown Sisera (Judg. 519), and there Necho had overthrown Josiah (2 Kings 2329). But John makes not the plain of Megiddo but the mountain of Megiddo (the meaning of Har-Magedon in v. 16) the scene of this final battle.

15. The description is interrupted here to insert a warning to watchfulness. Charles thinks this to be an interpolation, and he restores it to the middle of 33, because there is no hint that these plagues affect the Christians at all, and the sixth bowl will hardly take the world by surprise since the preparations for it must be on a great scale. The first reason is important, but a warning to watchfulness is appropriate at all times. Those who lived through the first two decades of this century will remember how easy it is to live with all the preparations for a world-wide catastrophe before their eyes and yet to be unaware of them (cf. Mt. 2438-44 1 Thess. 52-4 2 Pet. 310.)

17-21. The seventh plague is an earthquake. Rome (Babylon the Great—cf. 148) is described as split into three parts. This is not quite consistent with chs. 17, 18, where Rome is dealt with. The weight of the hail—a talent

(see p. 78b)—is about one hundredweight (cf. Ex. 918-26). For v. 19 cf. 148.

The truth of these vivid and arresting descriptions of judgment is not to be found in any exact correspondence between events in history and the words of these prophecies, but in the holiness of God and the inevitable consequences of sin. Dante and others have emphasized the seeming exultation with which John tells of the destiny of the persecutors of the church. Such a spirit seems directly contrary to our Lord's injunction, "Love your enemies," and is most inconsistent with his example, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But the spirit of the O.T., with its law of retaliation, is strong in the writer of this book; he has not as yet come to realize all the implications of the love of God revealed in Christ Jesus. Compared with other and Jewish apocalypses and many Christian writings of a later date, his descriptions of the punishment of the wicked are far from extreme. He would emphasize the inevitable punishment that awaits sin because of the holy love of God. Against some of the vague sentimentalism of to-day in reference to God's attitude to sin, it is well to recall that those who have suffered in times of persecution have always been upheld by their belief in the justice of God, which would not allow the sin of their oppressors to go unpunished, and to recall too, that those who are most sure of the love of God are those who feel most keenly the awful penalty which sin entails.

CHAPTER XVII

1-6. The Vision of the Judgment of the Great Harlot and of the Beast. Already the fall of Rome has been proclaimed under the name "Babylon" (148 1619). The identification of Babylon and Rome is made explicit, and the doom of the imperial city—the source of the persecution of the Christians—is described. Rome is the great harlot. In the O.T. the word "harlot" is used of Nineveh (Nah. 34), and of Tyre (Isa. 2317) in respect of their intercourse with the heathen world, their idolatry and immorality. So Rome had made the nations one with herself and corrupted them with the wine of her fornication. In Jer. 5113 Babylon is described as sitting on many waters, and so the phrase is added here, though the description as applied to Rome is inappropriate. (That is the reason for the interpretative gloss in v. 15.) The Seer in an ecstasy is carried into a wilderness, where he sees the woman sitting upon a scarlet-colored beast (v. 3). This is the Roman Empire (cf. 131-10), the description indicating its luxury and magnificence. The woman is full of names of blasphemy. In 13¹ (note) that phrase refers to the deified emperors. Perhaps here it refers to the goddess multitude of gods which Rome worshiped. The Beast has seven heads and ten horns which are explained in vv. 9–12. The woman holds in her hand a golden cup (cf. Jer. 51⁷), full of the abominations (v. 4) with which she has corrupted the nations. The harlots in Rome wore upon their brows labels bearing their names. The name of this woman written upon her forehead is a Mystery (v. 5), i.e., to be understood spiritually, not literally. And the name is Babylon, i.e., Babylon is the mystical name for Rome (cf. vv. 7f.). The description is not overdrawn. Tacitus describes Rome as “the place where all things hideous and shameful from every part of the world find their center and become popular.” The woman herself is drunken with the blood of the saints (v. 6)—the Jewish martyrs who fell in 66–70 A.D.—and of the martyrs of Jesus—the Christians who died in the Neronian persecution.

7–18. The Interpretation of the Vision. The description of the Beast, the symbol of the Roman Empire, as that which was and is not and is about to come (v. 8) is a parody of the divine name “Jehovah,” as written in 1⁴ (see note). The heads and horns belong to the mythological tradition, and that makes it difficult to be sure of the historical facts which they symbolize. To understand these things requires the intelligence which is wisdom. The seven heads of the Beast are described as seven hills (v. 9). Really this is a description of the woman—Rome, the city of the seven hills. But then the geographical facts fade and are replaced by political facts. For in v. 10 the seven heads are further called seven kings, i.e., emperors. Which? Probably the series is meant to begin with Augustus. Omitting Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who between them reigned only a few months, the seven would be Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero, Vespasian, Titus. Five are dead, the one is (v. 10). If the list is correct this is written in Vespasian’s reign. Titus is to come, but only to last for a short time. Perhaps the writer knew of the hopeless condition of Titus’ health. He is therefore either using a literary convention, and assuming an earlier date than is the fact to give his words the force of a prophecy concerning Titus, or, more likely, he is using here material written in Vespasian’s reign which partly suits his purpose and partly not; for there are very good reasons for thinking that this book was written, not in Vespasian’s reign, but in Domitian’s (see p. 1367b). Already John has identified the Beast with Nero redivivus, finding in the mysterious number of the Beast the letters of Nero’s name (13¹⁸, note). In v. 11 the Beast is said to be of the seven and himself an eighth. That has been interpreted as Domitian, who is regarded as an incarnation of Nero. But it can hardly be said of Domitian that he was and is not, nor is Domitian one of the seven. It is best interpreted as Nero redivivus, Anti-Christ. As the heads of the Beast symbolized emperors, so the horns (v. 12) symbolize kings, probably Parthian satraps. For popular superstition believed Nero to have escaped to the East and feared his return at the head of Parthian hosts. Three pretenders appeared between 69–88 A.D. under Nero’s name, and claimed the imperial throne. The expectation here is that Nero will return in fury against the city which at the last rose against him. The Anti-Christ thinks he is accomplishing his own purposes, but he is really marching to his own destruction, which is God’s purpose. The kings were unanimous in their purpose to destroy Rome (v. 13); God caused that unanimity, for he is all in all and works in all things. The forces which destroy Rome are themselves destroyed by the Lamb and the martyr host of warriors. The Lamb is called Lord of lords and King of kings (v. 14; cf. 19¹⁶ Deut. 10¹⁷ Dan. 2⁴⁷), perhaps as a challenge to the title given to Domitian of “our Lord and our God.” The significance of the title is also in the fact that, whatever the conflicts on earth between good and evil, the victory of goodness has already been won in heaven, and on that heavenly victory depends the ultimate victory on earth.

CHAPTER XVIII

The Doom of Rome. This was the vision promised to the Seer in 17¹.

1–3. A Great Angel. This angel comes down from heaven and announces the fall of Babylon, i.e., Rome, and tells how the ruins of the city have become the dwelling place of unclean spirits and hateful birds. The tense is the past tense of prophetic certainty; it represents that which was destined to be as though it had already happened.

4–20. Features That Will Accompany the Doom. Another voice from heaven summons the people of God to come forth out of the city (cf. Jer. 51⁴⁵ Mt. 24¹⁶) to escape the plagues by which she will be punished; and then in the style of prophetic passages from the O.T. chants a song of doom over her (cf. Isa. 13, 14, 34; Jer. 50, 51; Ezek. 26–28). Though Rome in her wantonness says I will sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall in no wise see mourning (v. 7; cf. Isa. 47⁸), double punishment will be her lot (Jer. 16¹⁸). Suddenly plagues will come upon her—pestilence, destruction, famine, and fire. If Nero and the Parthians are her destroyers, it would mean the cutting off of her food supplies, hence famine and pestilence (v. 8). The greatness of the calamity which shall overtake her is suggested by the dirges which those who have shared in her impurity shall sing. The kings shall stand at a distance and wail over her (v. 9), afraid lest they be themselves swallowed up in her destruction. The merchants (Ezek. 27³⁶) shall lament the loss of their trade (v. 11). The long list of imports into Rome closes dramatically as in Ezek. 27²⁷⁻³⁰) shall bewail the loss of their freights (v. 17). But saints and apostles and prophets are called upon to rejoice as in Jer. 51⁴⁸ because the judgment of God has been wrought over her (v. 20).

8. The word here translated death probably means "pestilence," and the word translated mourning may mean "destruction" (68, note).

20. Charles puts this verse between vv. 23 and 24.

21-24. The Final Description of the Doom. This is preluded by a symbolic action on the part of another angel, who throws a millstone into the sea to represent the ruin of Rome (cf. Jer. 51^{63, 64}). Then the description is resumed of the silence and desolation of the ruins. The familiar sounds of the household, of its work, its rejoicings, will be no more heard; the arts of civil life will cease; the light of the lamp will be extinguished (cf. Jer. 25¹⁰ Ezek. 26¹³). If Charles is right as to the position of v. 20 (see above), then the chapter ends with the summons to the saints, apostles and prophets to rejoice over the fate of the harlot city that was the cause of all the blood shed upon the earth (cf. Jer. 51⁴⁹). Rome could not be charged with all the martyrdoms which had occurred in the history of Israel, but as the mistress of the world Rome is held responsible for all that happened in the empire.

Was the Prophecy Fulfilled? Rome never was destroyed quite as this prophecy foretells, though the sack of the city by the Goths, the crumbling of her empire, and the decay of her power are facts of history. Gibbon quotes an Italian writer, Poggius, who in the fifteenth century described the ruins of the city as he had seen them. The last part of his description is apposite: "The Forum of the Roman people, where they assembled to enact their laws and elect their magistrates, is now inclosed for the cultivation of pot-herbs and thrown open for the reception of swine and buffaloes. The public and private edifices that were founded for eternity lie prostrate, naked and broken, like the limbs of a mighty giant: and the ruin is the more visible from the stupendous relics that have survived the injuries of time and fortune" (see Decline and Fall of Roman Empire, ch. 71). But the particular fulfillment of a prophecy like this is not its most important element. It had reference to a particular time and a particular city. But just as the Seer uses ancient prophecy about Babylon, Tyre, and Edom to describe the judgment of God on Rome, so the permanent value of his prophecy is in its message of the victory of righteousness over evil, even though evil arm itself with the strongest political, material and mechanical resources. In his commentary on Isa. 47, George Adam Smith reminds us that we must not choke our interest in such prophecies in the dust and ruins which were their first fulfillment, because Babylon never dies. John saw that this city of harlotries, of which the prophets had spoken, had come to life again in Rome. We may see the same spirit wherever there are forgetfulness of God, militarism, and the acquiescence in the existence of hideous and naked wrong because it has been long established, and because political and financial interests are supported by it. Perhaps the most common incarnation of this spirit is the worship of wealth. The description of the fate of such worship is found in vv. 11-16, which record the ruin of the commercial city, that lived only for success, and the loneliness of her mercenary life, for the merchants stood afar off from the city in her hour of destruction—the city that had only been to them a place of gain and pleasure. Babylon and Rome both stood for arrogance, hardness of heart, the worship of success, indifference to all the higher values of life. Against these things and their fate this vision is a memorable warning and John's words still have their personal summons—Come forth, that ye have no fellowship with her sins (v. 4).

CHAPTER XIX

1-10. The Heavenly Anthem Over the Doom of Rome. In 18²⁰ the Seer had appealed to the host of heaven. These verses are the response first by the angels, and then by the elders and the Cherubim (cf. 4¹¹ 5⁸⁻¹⁴ 11¹⁶), and then by the martyrs over the judgment on Rome. John's method is to set over against a vision of tribulation one of deliverance; and over against a proclamation of judgment on the enemies of Christ to set one of the ultimate blessedness of the redeemed. Actually the doom of Rome (ch. 18) is future; from the point of view of heaven it is past.

6. Read Hallelujah! for the Lord God Almighty has become king. There are two stages in the destruction of evil in the universe; the first was when Satan was cast out of heaven; the second is when Rome is destroyed and God becomes King of the earth. Again the writer has in mind Domitian's title, "Our Lord and our God."

7, 8. The marriage of the Lamb. The figure goes back to the O.T. representation of Jehovah married to Israel (Hos. 2¹⁹ Isa. 54¹⁻⁸). Here it denotes the indissoluble communion of Christ with the community of men and women whom he has purchased with his blood (56, 9 7¹⁷ 14¹). This community is the martyrs, who reign with Christ for a thousand years; it is, indeed, the Holy City itself (21⁹ 22¹⁷). It is the part of the church to make herself ready, and it is given her by God to clothe herself (cf. Phil. 2¹², 13). The bright, pure raiment of the bride is in striking contrast with the harlot's vesture (17⁴ 18¹⁶). This raiment is interpreted as the righteous acts of the saints, and refers to the spiritual bodies which the righteous have in accordance with their characters.

9. They which are bidden. All men are called by God, but when the time has come for the bride to become the wife of the Lamb the faithful are bidden, invited (Mt. 22³ Lk. 14⁸), and upon those bidden this blessing is pronounced. There is a natural confusion in that the church is the bride and at the same time is the guests at the wedding supper.

10. This incident is repeated in 22⁸, 9, and may be an interpolation here. If not, what causes John to offer the homage is the overwhelming impression of the vision of heaven which he has seen. The testimony of Jesus may mean (1) the testimony which men bear to Jesus; if so, the angel is claiming that he is a fellow servant of all who have the prophetic spirit; or (2) the testimony borne by Jesus, i.e., the revelation made by him. Then the angel means that the spirit of prophecy is governed by the revelation of "the truth as it is in Jesus."

11-16. The Vision of a Divine Warrior on a White Horse Leading the Armies of Heaven. The subject of the marriage of the Lamb is not proceeded with until 21², but John recounts the judgments upon the Beast, the False Prophet and the Dragon. The name no one knoweth but he himself (v. 12) is variously interpreted. It may mean the Lord (Phil. 2¹¹);

or Jehovah; or a name known only to Christ (cf. 3¹²). The reference is to the belief that to know the name of a God gave one power over him. The name at least corresponds to his nature. It cannot be known to any on earth, for none can know the depths of his personality. The Word of God (v. 13) is the Messiah (cf. Jn. 1¹). But the conception of the Word is more akin to Heb. 4¹² than to the prologue of the fourth Gospel. He is not here described as "the Word that tabernacled among men" giving them light and life, but as the Warrior-judge. His flaming eyes see through all deceit. Upon his head are the tokens of universal sovereignty. The blood on his vesture is not his own but of his foes (cf. Isa. 63¹⁻³). The sharp sword (v. 15) is the symbol of judicial condemnation (cf. 1¹⁶ 2¹²). There follow him the white-clad armies of heaven on white horses—a symbol of victory. The two metaphors of the winepress and the cup of wrath (v. 15) are mixed (cf. 14¹⁰, 19, note). The meaning is that from the winepress trodden by the divine warrior (Isa. 63³) flows the wine of the wrath of God, and his enemies are to be made to drink of it. Probably we should omit the words on his garment (v. 16) with some authorities. Then the reference is to the names of statues or to inscriptions which were often written on the thighs of statues. The picture is of the Divine Warrior leading his heavenly host and sweeping on against the armies of the Beast. So swift is the charge that their garments stream behind them and on the thigh of their Leader is disclosed the name King of Kings, Lord of Lords (cf. 17¹⁴, note; 1 Tim. 6¹⁵). Again a challenge to Domitian's title, "Our Lord and our God."

17, 18. The Vision of an Angel in Mid-Heaven Summoning the Birds of Prey to Feast on the Slain. (Cf. Ezek. 39¹⁷⁻²⁰.) There is a contrast between the great supper of God here and the marriage supper of the Lamb in v. 9. That the dead should be left unburied for the birds of prey to feast on added to the shame of defeat. In no way could the dishonor of these captains and mighty men be more forcefully described than in this.

19-21. The Final Battle of Armageddon. (See note on 16¹⁶.) John describes the struggle of the Warrior on the white horse with the Beast, the False Prophet and the kings of the earth. The reason for the summoning of the birds of prey is now given. The battle has been fought between the heavenly Warrior and his foes. The Beast is Nero Anti-Christ, and his followers are the Parthian kings, whom Nero, when he returned, was expected to bring with him. The issue of the battle only is described. The Beast, i.e., the empire, and the False Prophet, i.e., the imperial priesthood, which practiced all kinds of magic to beguile men to worship Rome and her emperors (cf. 16¹³, 14 13¹¹), are cast alive into the lake of fire (cf. 20¹⁰, 15 21⁸); and the rest of their army is slain and their corpses left to the birds to feed on.

CHAPTER XX

The Problem of the Rearrangement of Chapters 20–22. R. H. Charles' suggested rearrangement of these chapters, which in their present order seem to be confusing, is considered in the introduction, p. 1368.

1–3. The Binding of Satan for a Thousand Years. This is the climax of the divine judgments. Already Rome has fallen; the kings of the earth have been destroyed; the two Beasts have been cast into the lake of fire (19²⁰). As Satan's expulsion from heaven is connected with the birth and ascension of Christ (12^{1–11}), so his chaining here is connected with Christ's Second Coming.

2. A thousand years. Originally the Messianic kingdom was thought of as lasting forever (see pp. 208–9), but in the last century B.C. this earth came to be regarded as wholly evil and suitable for the manifestation of the Kingdom only temporarily. In the apocryphal apocalypse, the Secrets of Enoch (322–332), the history of the world is divided into days, each day representing 1,000 years (cf. Psa. 90⁴ 2 Pet. 3⁸). Since, including the day of rest, there were seven days of creation (Gen. 1) the world was to last for 7,000 years, the last day, or 1,000 years, being a Sabbath-millennium. John identifies the 1,000 years of rest and blessedness in the world's history with the period of the reign of the Messiah on earth. The number 1,000 is symbolical, like most of the numbers which John uses. It is described as for a little time in v. 3. The idea behind it is that of perfection and completeness.

4–6. The Vision of the Glorified Martyrs Reigning With Christ for the Thousand Years. The apocalyptic writers generally in their conception of the Messianic kingdom pictured the saints as reigning with the Messiah. Jesus had used these thought forms to convey his spiritual message of the reality of judgment and reward (Mt. 19²⁸; cf. 1 Cor. 6², 3). Here it is not those who are alive when the Lord comes who will reign with him (cf. 1 Thess. 4^{14–17}). John does not believe there will be any survivors of the faithful on earth; all will have suffered martyrdom before the Day of the Lord comes. And it is not all who have "died in the Lord" who are to share his reign with him. Only the martyrs will have this reward of loyalty. In 6¹¹ the souls of the martyrs are given each a white robe, i.e., a spiritual resurrection body when they are waiting for their roll to be complete. In the present passage, the roll is complete and the host of the martyrs rise in the first resurrection (see v. 5 below), in which the rest of the dead take no part. This is peculiar to John and is due to the emphasis he lays on martyrdom. In his day that might well have been stressed as the only test of loyalty, although we know that there are other tests. He defines these martyrs as priests of God and of Christ (v. 6), perhaps as having special functions of evangelizing the nations during the reign of Christ on earth.

5. The first resurrection has been interpreted in a spiritual sense as a resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. But it is clearly the reward of martyrdom at the end of life on earth, and to allegorize it away is to introduce a method of interpretation which takes most of the significance out of language.

6. The second death is the death at the end of the Messianic kingdom after the Last Judgment, as distinguished from the physical death which is the lot of all humanity (cf. 20¹⁴ 21⁸ Mt. 10⁸).

7–10. The Vision of the End of the Messianic Kingdom. At the end of the one thousand years Satan is loosed and with Gog and Magog attacks the beloved city. He is cast into the lake of fire where already the Beast and the False Prophet had been cast (19²⁰). Gog is from the land of Magog in Ezek. 38². In Gen. 10² he is called Magog, son of Japheth. Elsewhere they are both leaders in battle against God and Messiah. Here they represent all the faithless upon earth.

11–15. The Last Judgment. A great white throne is set, in the light from which the secrets of all hearts are revealed. Its whiteness symbolizes the equity of the judgment. He who sits upon it is not named, and he is alone on the judgment seat, not accompanied by the martyrs as in v. 4. The heaven and the earth disappear. Jewish contemporary thought accepted this notion of the end of all things (cf. 2 Pet. 3^{10–12}) and the beginning anew (cf. 21¹); but perhaps here the thought is that in the presence of the Supreme Judge men lose consciousness of everything else. All are judged according to their works and for this the books are opened (v. 12). These (cf. Dan. 7¹⁰) recorded the deeds done in the flesh, good or bad. And there is another book which had in it the names of the saved (cf. 3⁵ 13⁸ 17⁸). The books of deeds were "vouchers for the Book of Life." Before the throne stand the dead given up by Death and Hades (v. 13; in this book Hades is the intermediate state where the souls of the righteous are). The sea too surrenders those whom it has swallowed up. Death and Hades are cast into the lake of fire (v. 14; cf. Mt. 25⁴¹). They are personified as two demons in 1 Cor. 15^{26, 54}.

13. Sea. Charles says that this reference to the sea involves an idea of bodily resurrection which was common in rabbinic tradition but is not taught elsewhere in this book or in the N.T. It would seem from v. 11 that the sea had already disappeared. So Charles reads—and the treasuries gave up their dead, i.e., the treasures which contained the souls of the righteous.

CHAPTER XXI

1-8. The Vision of the New Universe and its Inhabitants. The Seer takes up again the theme of 19^{7f}, the marriage of the Lamb. Earth and heaven having perished (20¹¹) a new universe appears, new not in the time sense of being young and not old, but new in quality, transformed, like but unlike the other (cf. Isa. 65¹⁷). There is no sea in it (v. 1). This echoes the horror of the peoples of the ancient world, and especially of the Jews, of the sea, "the unplumb'd, salt, estranging sea," the great divider of men and lands. There could be no such devouring enemy of man in the world made perfect. John sees the new Jerusalem coming down from heaven as a bride (cf. Isa. 61¹⁰—62⁵ Mt. 22² 25¹⁰). Before describing it he relates what he heard about the meaning of the vision. This new Jerusalem (cf. Gal. 4²⁶) signifies the manifestation of the divine presence (v. 3); God is to dwell with men, and the inhabitants of the city are to be his peoples. The plural of this word peoples is sometimes used with the same meaning as the singular, but if the plural here has its full force, then the meaning is that there will be one kingdom but many peoples, as in Jn. 10¹⁶ our Lord speaks of "one flock" but "many folds." By the presence of God himself all sorrow and even death are banished (v. 4). He himself proclaims that he makes all things new (Isa. 43¹⁹ 2 Cor. 5¹⁷). All will have won in this Kingdom the "more life and fuller" which is beyond the pain and travail of this life. This glorious vision is related to the present distress of those for whom he writes, by the message from God himself, who holds out hope to him that is athirst (v. 6). There follows a list of those who have disfranchised themselves—the fearful and others, who in the struggle with the Beast have played the coward, denied the faith and worshiped the emperor. Not for them the divine sonship, but, rather, the lake of fire (cf. 19²⁰), the dreadful death at the Last Judgment after their physical death (cf. 21¹ 20^{6, 14, 15}).

6. Alpha and Omega. See note below on 22¹³.

9-27. Description of the City. (Continued in 22¹⁻⁵.) One of the seven angels who had the bowls bids John come to see the bride. Perhaps it was the same angel who showed him the judgment of the great harlot (17¹). The contrast is a stimulus to awe and hope. The description that follows is based upon the idealized conception of prophets and psalmists. Though, as they knew it, the city was cursed by the wickedness of its rulers, the idolatry of its people, and often despoiled by its enemies, it remained the city of God. It may well be that in the pagan idea of heaven as the city of the gods with the sun and moon and twelve signs of the zodiac is the germ of the Jewish conception. But into these words a new idealized meaning was implanted. The Jerusalem that now is was unworthy to be the center of the Messianic kingdom, but the hope arose that its heavenly counterpart (Gal. 4²⁶), which had been prepared in heaven from the beginning, would come down to be the abode of God's Messiah on earth. This idea of the heavenly Jerusalem was not widely held before the destruction of the earthly city in 70 A.D., but the conception of an idealized city is found in Isa. 54¹¹ Ezek. 40. John has, however, remolded the older pictures "nearer to the heart's desire." The earthly Temple was the symbol of God's presence; the new Jerusalem has the Shekinah, the glory of his presence (cf. v. 3). It is surrounded by a wall, and it has twelve gates which bear the names of the tribes of Israel, and the foundations of the city have the names of the twelve apostles engraven on them (v. 12). This symbolizes the connection between the O.T. and the Christian Church. The wall marks the security of its citizens, a protection against the wicked and unclean (21²⁷). The twelve gates each with a guardian angel denote that it can be entered from different sides and in different ways. It is not required of those who enter that they should be limited to one language or race or point of view. The angel measures the city to reveal the meaning of it to John (vv. 15-17). It is a square, the symbol of perfection to the Greeks. In v. 16 it is described as a cube following the analogy of the Holy of Holies. Each side or perhaps all the sides together measure twelve thousand furlongs, nearly fifteen hundred miles. The foundations of the walls are precious stones (vv. 19–21), which correspond on the whole with those on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. 28¹⁷⁻²⁰). These were connected with the signs of the zodiac, but are given here in the reverse order from that which the sun follows through those signs. The impression which this description makes is of perfect beauty. Goodness, truth and beauty are the three eternal values which belong to the life of the spirit. All are characteristic of the city of God. Even the splendor of the sun is put to shame by the glory of God himself (v. 23). The gates of the city are always open to the nations (v. 25), and as cities of the earth are enriched by the gifts of kings and nations, so the glory and honor of the nations shall be brought into this city (v. 26; Isa. 60¹⁹). No unclean or false persons are allowed to enter but only those whose names are in the Book of Life (v. 27).

CHAPTER XXII

1–5. Description of the City Continued. (See 21⁹⁻²⁷.) In the midst of the heavenly way there runs a river like the river in Eden which watered the garden (cf. 7¹⁶, 17 21⁶ Ezek. 47¹⁻¹² Jer. 21³ Zech. 14⁸ Jn. 4¹⁰). On each side of the river are trees of life (the singular is generic), which bear twelve different kinds of fruit, one each month, and the leaves are for the healing of the nations (cf. Ezek. 47¹²). There shall be in this city no accursed things (cf. Zech. 14¹¹ Isa. 59²). God's servants having his name on their foreheads (7³ 14¹), i.e., his character stamped upon them, are qualified for the vision of himself (cf. Mt. 5⁸). He shall give them light (v. 5) is a shortened form of "He shall cause his face to shine upon them" (Psa. 67¹ 80³, 7, 19).

3. His servants shall do him service (A.S.V. serve him). There is a familiar story of a monk who in his early life, after having studied this book with some companions, was asked by the teacher which promise in the book seemed to him most attractive. He answered, "His servants shall serve him."

One naturally asks the question, Is this kingdom present or future? Is it an idealized representation of the Christian Church or a picture of a perfect state of society not yet realized on earth? The ideal city of the future is an ideal for the present. Socrates in Plato's Republic says that perhaps in heaven is laid up a pattern of the ideal city (which Glaucon, his interlocutor, says is not to be found anywhere on earth) for him who wishes to behold it and beholding to organize himself accordingly. And the question of its present or future existence on earth is quite unimportant. For in any case he will adopt the practices of such a city to the exclusion of those of any other (cf. Phil. 3²⁰). No process of development or mechanical progress is here conceived as producing this city. It is not through an orderly evolution but after the crisis of judgment that it comes down from heaven. In this ideal city John sees the bride of the Lamb (21²), the society of the redeemed pure and spotless. In it Christ sees of the travail of his soul and is satisfied (Isa. 53¹¹).

The Epilogue and Benediction. (Vv. 6–21.) These closing passages contain various testimonies, warnings, and invitations, an adjuration, and a benediction.

6, 7. Christ's Testimony to John's Book. The most significant part of the message is in v. 7, Behold, I come quickly (cf. 3¹¹ 17).

8, 9. John's Own Testimony. A last warning against angel worship (cf. 19⁹, 10 Col. 2¹⁸).

10–15. Final Injunctions and Warnings. John is forbidden to seal the book (cf. 10⁴ Dan. 12⁴ Isa. 8¹⁶, 17). The reference is to the sealing of apocalypses, i.e., the withholding of them until the actual time of the author. V. 11 suggests that the character that has been formed is fixed or that the present age is so near its conclusion that there is not time for change. Christ is coming quickly and each will be rewarded as he deserves (v. 12). He is the Alpha and Omega (v. 13), the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet (cf. 18, 11 21⁶). This was an ancient saying even in Plato's time and originally seems to have been "Zeus is the beginning and the middle and the end of all things" (cf. Rom. 11³⁶). God is the initial cause, the sustaining cause and the final cause of all things.

"Yea through life, death, through sorrow and through sinning

Christ shall suffice me, for he hath sufficed;
Christ is the end, for Christ was the beginning,
Christ the beginning, for the end is Christ."

—F. W. H. Myers, St. Paul.

Vv. 14, 15 show that character alone, not race, nor position, nor birth, decides men's fitness for the Kingdom. To enter the gates must precede the eating of the tree, but John may be thinking of Christ as the tree of life, and as the gate into the city; those who partake of him enter the city; those who find in him the way of life know him as the gate into the city. Every one that loveth and maketh a lie, i.e., makes falsehood his object and practices it. This is put as the climax to the list. Those who deny the truth cannot have part with Him who is the Way because he is the Truth, and the Truth because he is the Life (Jn. 14⁶).

16. Further Testimony of Jesus. Jesus

claims to be the root and branches, and so to combine in himself all the Messianic claims of David's family (cf. 55 Isa. 11¹, 10 Mt. 1¹). He is the morning star (22⁸), i.e., in him is all that Israel hoped for in the past; in him is the promise of all that is to come (cf. Num. 24¹⁷ Mt. 22 Lk. 17⁸).

17. The Invitation of the Spirit and of the Bride. The Spirit is Christ himself (cf. 27. 11, 17), and the Bride (cf. 21²) is the inhabitants of the heavenly Jerusalem, and those who have heard and accepted the message are those who are thirsting for life and truth. It is not, as it is sometimes understood, a call to Christ to come. He has come already and is reigning in the city (20⁴).

18, 19. Solemn Adjuration Respecting Any Who Should Alter the Words of the Book. It was customary to append such among Jewish and Christian writers (Deut. 42 123²). The fact that the words happen to come at the end of the English Bible has led some to suppose that they applied to the whole Bible itself. This, of course, is not so. As a matter of fact, several N.T. books were written after Revelation (see p. 858a).

20, 21. Christ's Final Words, John's Prayer and Benediction. Come, Lord Jesus recalls Marana tha (1 Cor. 16²²), meaning "our Lord come," or, "our Lord has come." The benediction shows that the book was intended to be read in the church services (cf. 13). The saints means the faithful. Paul uses the word for the whole body of the baptized (Rom. 16¹⁵ 1 Cor. 16¹ 2 Cor. 11 Eph. 1¹ Col. 14).

The Real Value of the Revelation of John. The expectation of the immediate return of Christ has been with John all through. His final message is it is at hand. But the Lord did not come when John anticipated. The value of this book is not in its accuracy of prediction of the future but in its insight into the things that are unseen and in its power to kindle faith in those things. The O.T. prophets were true prophets, even if some of the things they predicted were never realized. They used the crises of national history to set forth the true ideals and destiny of their nation. It is because their words are a testimony to the moral order in the universe that they arouse the conscience and have a message for times quite other than those in which they were written. So John, dealing with the consummation of all things, bears witness that behind all the events of time is a moral order, and that moral order will be made clear in the revelation of Christ as Redeemer and Lord.

In regard to the coming of Christ, Swete points out that, according to Paul, it takes place with the change from flesh and blood into the spiritual body, so that it is not likely to be apparent to our present organs of sense. It may be that the change in ourselves will be the appearing of Christ: Christ most truly appears according as he becomes enthroned in human hearts and his spirit becomes enthroned in social institutions.

Like the other apocalyptists, John felt sure that the kingdom of God under the conditions of this world could be only temporary. Only the spiritual could be permanent. Therefore he looked for a new order, a spiritual order, a Jerusalem that was to be transformed to the conditions of that spiritual order where the saints would dwell forever with God and with the Lamb. The value of these visions is that they have taught men to look forward, not backward, to strive toward an ideal which men recognize as that which ought to be, and that to which the whole creation moves. The ideal is a new state of society on earth, of which the foundations are peace and brotherhood, justice and mercy. That has been given a hundred different expressions among men, but no more fitting symbol has been found for it than that of the heavenly Jerusalem. But John did not regard this as the end. It was a means to a spiritual kingdom, in which alone man's true destiny and his eternal home could be realized. The heavenly Jerusalem answers to the earthly hopes of others besides Christians; the new Jerusalem is the completion of hopes which can never be realized on earth. And that "more life and fuller" which Christianity has inspired men to hope for has never been more adequately described than in 213⁴. On the one hand are the visions of the doom of the lost, which, though in some respects more Jewish than Christian, may remind us that persistent rebellion against God renders the soul liable to some measure of eternal disability and loss. On the other hand are his visions of the victory, peace, consolation, worship, knowledge and fullness of perfect being. Dante follows out these by his description of the redeemed shining like a great white rose unfolding itself petal by petal in the presence of the glory of God.

"In fashion, as a snow white rose, lay then Before my view the saintly multitude,
Which in his own blood Christ espoused."

—Paradise, canto xxxi.

VI. MAPS

PERIOD OF THE WILDERNESS WANDERINGS (1200-1150 B. C.)

PERIOD OF THE HEBREW SETTLEMENT OF CANAAN (1150-1050 B. C.)

ASSYRIAN, BABYLONIAN AND PERSIAN EMPIRES

UNITED HEBREW KINGDOM (1050-937 B. C.)

DIVIDED HEBREW KINGDOM (937-586 B. C.)

RESTORED JEWISH COMMUNITY IN PALESTINE (538-167 B. C.)

HEROD'S KINGDOM (40-4 B. C.)

PALESTINE IN THE TIME OF JESUS (4 B. C.-30 A. D.)

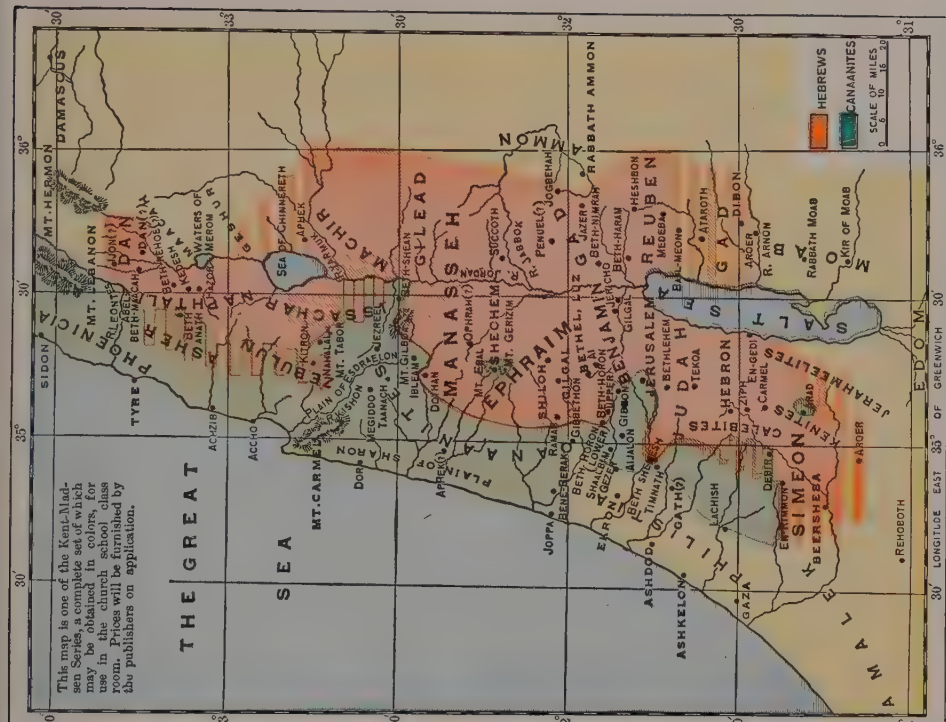

TOPOGRAPHICAL MAP OF PALESTINE

ST. PAUL'S JOURNEYS AND THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH (40-100 A. D.)

The Kent-Madsen Series of maps, illustrated on the following pages, are now out of print and no longer available for classroom use.

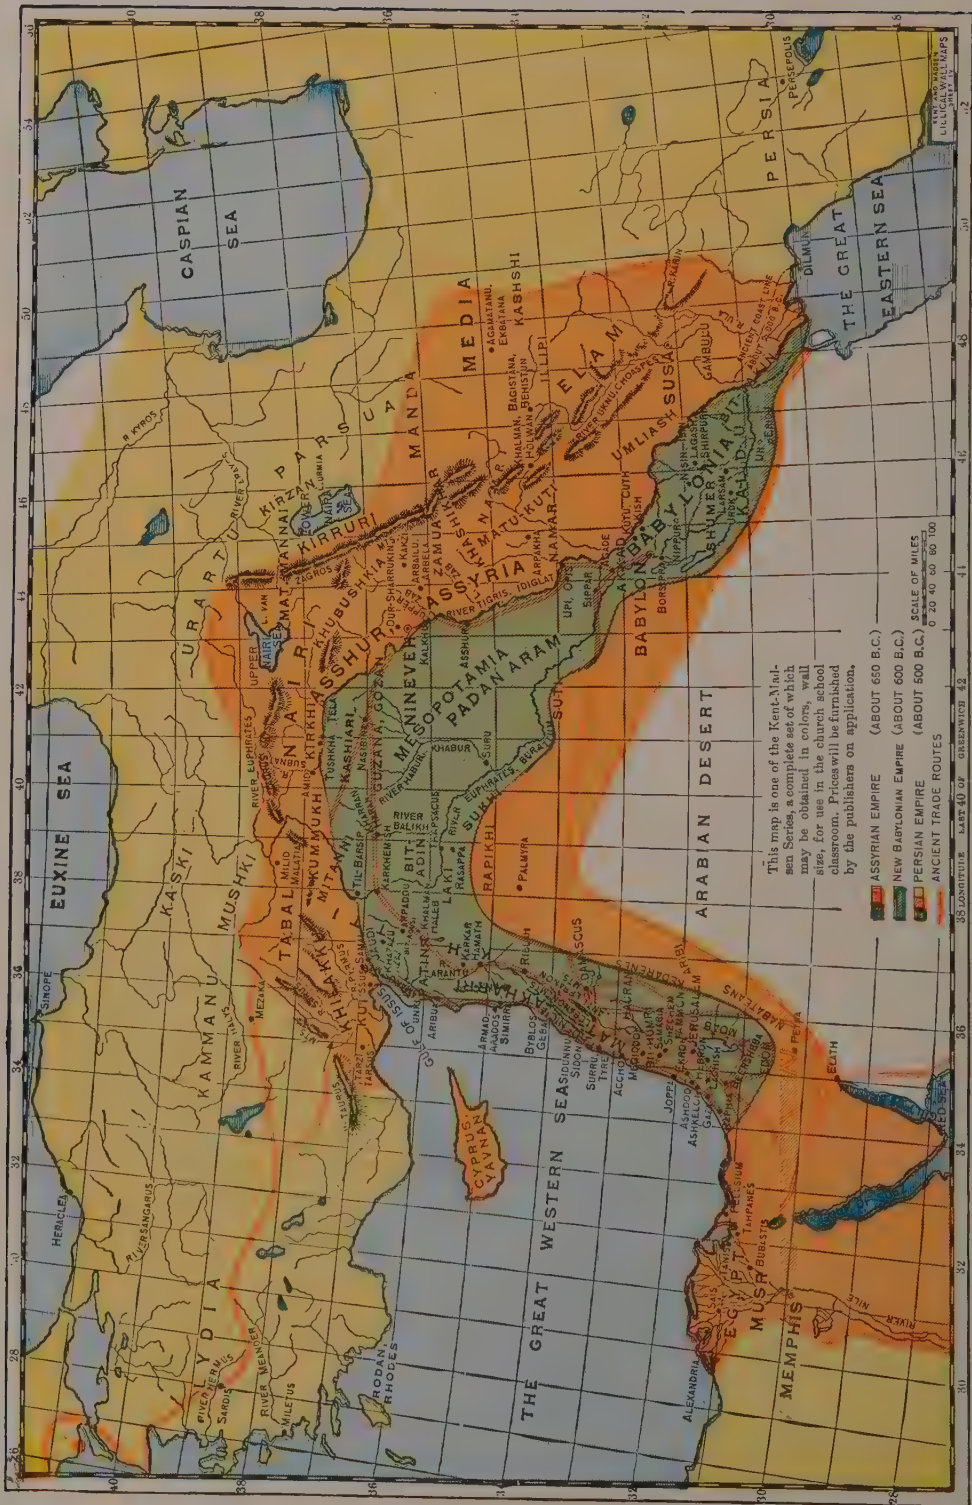

COPYRIGHT, 1900 AND 1912, BY CHARLES FOSTER KENT
 PERIOD OF THE WILDERNESS WANDERINGS (1200-1150 B.C.)

ABINGDON-COKESBURY PRESS, NEW YORK - NASHVILLE
 PERIOD OF THE HEBREW SETTLEMENT OF CANAAN (1150-1050 B.C.)

This map is one of the Kent-Madsen Series, a complete set of which may be obtained in colors, for use in the church school class room. Prices will be furnished by the publishers on application.

ASSYRIAN, BABYLONIAN, AND PERSIAN EMPIRES

Copyright 1902 by Charles Postel Kent. Published April 1909

ABINGDON-COKESBURY PRESS, NEW YORK - NASHVILLE

UNITED HEBREW KINGDOM (1050-937 B.C.)

DIVIDED HEBREW KINGDOM (937-586 B.C.)

Topographical Map of PALESTINE

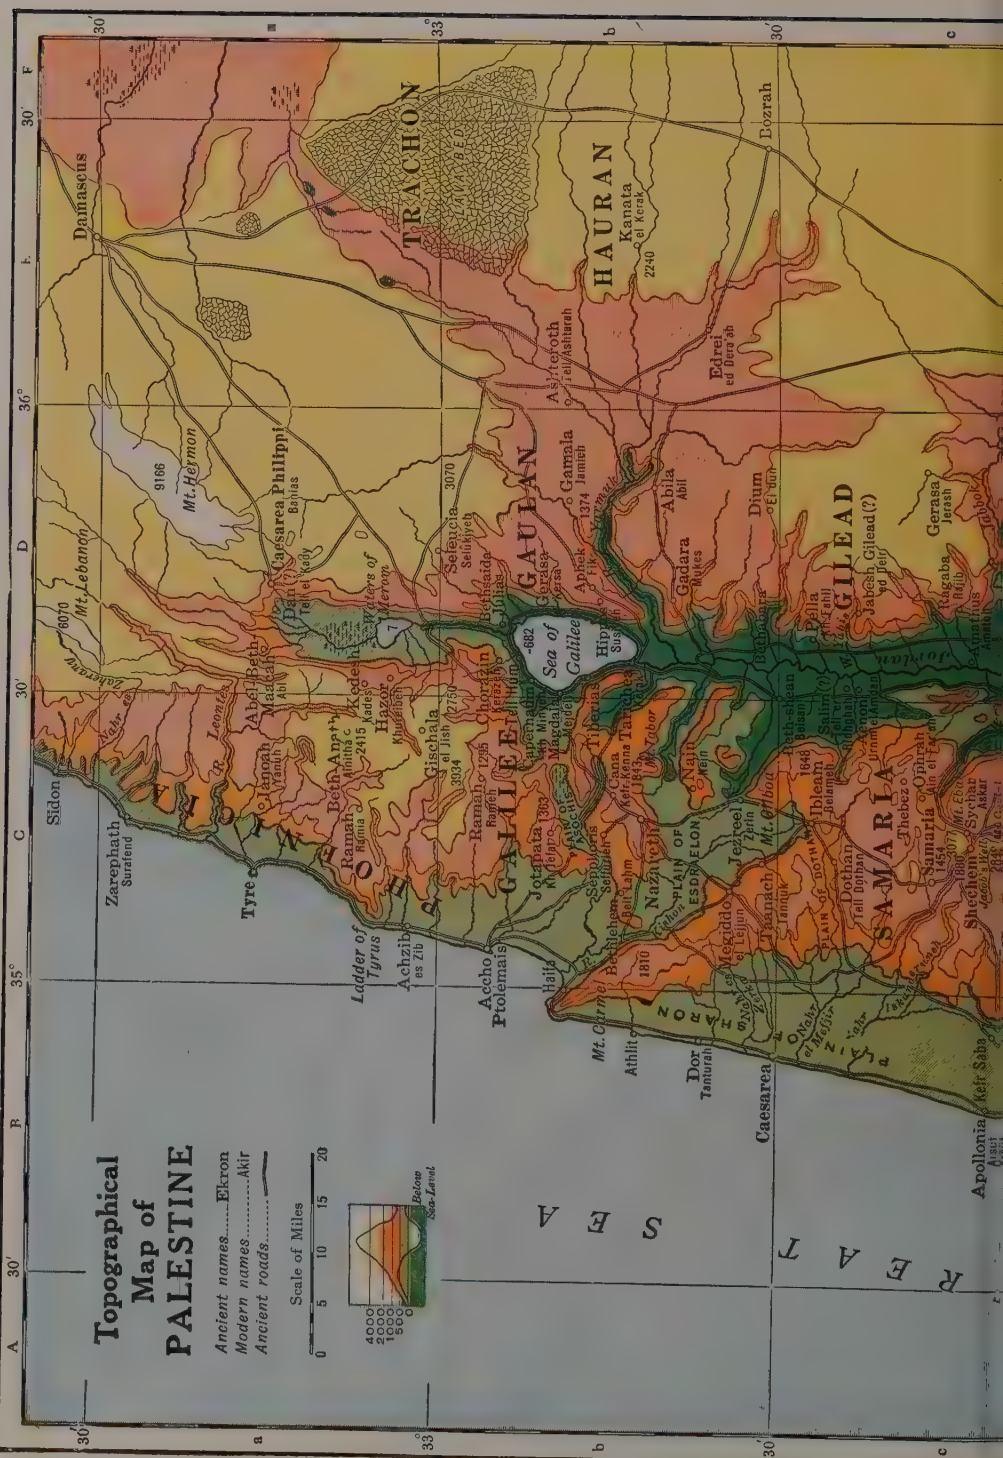

Ancient names.....Ekron
Modern names.....Akir
Ancient roads.....

Scale of Miles
0 5 10 15 20

S E A

R E A T

This map is one of the best. It is a complete set of maps, and may be obtained in colors, wall size, for use in the church school classroom. Prices will be furnished by the publishers on application.

ST. PAUL'S JOURNEYS AND THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH (40-100 A.D.)

Scale of Miles
0 25 50 100 150

VII. INDEX

INDEX

NOTE—While this Index is fairly extensive, it is in no sense exhaustive. The purpose has not been to provide a concordance. Names of individuals or of places are listed only when the reference contains some definite statement about them. If a reference is not found under a given word, it may frequently be found under a related word. The letters a and b following a number refer respectively to the left and right columns of the page. See also the Explanations on pages xv and xvi.

A

- A, Codex Alexandrinus, 860b, contents, 862b
α, Codex Sinaiticus, 860b, contents, 862b
 Aaron, consecration, 284, death, 308b, descendants as priests, 131b, golden calf, 275, opposes Moses, 303a, priesthood, 115b, 170a, 372a, religious head, 258a, rod, 260a, spokesman for Moses, 257, 259b
 Ab, 77b
 Abaddon (destruction), 500b, 1382b
 Abarama (= Abram), 116a
 Abarim, 693a
 Abba, 881b, 882a, 883a, 1216b
 Abdi-Khiba, 116b
 Abed-nego, 748b
 Abel, faith of, 1319b, story of, 224
 Abel-Mizraim, 247b
 Abel-Shittim, 346b
 Abiathar, 406a, 416a
 Abib (Nisan), 77b
 Abigail and David, 395
 Abihu, 313a, his sin, 285
 Abijah, reign of, 448b
 Abijam, reign of, 425a
 Abimelech, (1) of Gerar, and Abraham, 233, 234a; (2) Gideon's son, story of, 63b, 357b, 365-6
 Abiram, challenges David, 305
 Abner, assassinated, 400a, David and, 399, Joab and, 75a
 "Abomination of desolation," 189a, 758a, 1015
 Abraham, 228-35, Abimelech and, 233, 234a, bosom, 1050a, covenant, 175a, 230-1, Egypt, 229a, faith of, 147b, 219a, 1144-6, 1213a, 1320a, Isaac, 139a, 234, Lot, 229, Melchizedek, 1310, Mesopotamian rulers, 229-30, migration, 61a, name, 231b, Palestine reached, 228b, promises to, 178a, 228b, 1308b, Sarah, 133a, "sister," 133a
 Abram (see Abraham), the name on inscriptions, 116a
 Absalom, David and, 404-8, rebellion, 148, 405-8, Tamar avenged, 404b
 Absoluteness of God, 163
 Absolutism, Jesus on, 988a
 Abstinence, 300b
 Abyss, 120a, 212b, 1382b
 Acacias, 774
 Acceptable year, 672a
 Accursed, 349a
Aceldama (field of blood), 993a
 Achan, trespass of, 350a
 Achikar, 195
 Achish, David and, 395-6
 Achmetha, 466b
 Achor, valley of, 56a
 Achsah, 361a
 Achzib, 793a
 Acre, plain of, 53-4
 Acrostics, 154b, in Lamentations, 709b, in Nahum, 800a, in Psalms, 519a, 584b
 Acts of Apostles, church history, 1094a, divisions of, 876-8, epistles and, 1094a, language, 883a, Luke and, 1023-4, miracles, 927-9, 1095b, origin and purpose, 857a, sources, 1095a, speeches in, 1095a
 Adadnirai III, 111a
 Adam, Christ and, 1147-8, Eve, 203b, fall, 203-4, meaning of name, 126a, 203b, 225a
Adam and Eve, Books of, 196b
 Adar, 77b
 Additions to Gospels, 3b, 869b
 Adiabene, 848
 Adjuration, 282a
Adonai (=Lord), 256b
 Adoni-Bezek, 360b
 Adonijah, 416a
 Adoption, Paul on, 937a, 1214a
 Adullam, 394a
 Adultery, Israel's, 723-4, 760a, Jesus on, 963b, laws on, 335a, metaphor of, 729, 1336a, Proverbs on, 607a
 Advent (see Second Coming)
 Adversary, 503a
 Advocate, Holy Spirit, 1353b
 Ægean, archaeology and, 114b
 Æneas, healed, 927, 1106a
 Æschylus, Job and, 489a
 Affliction, God enduring, 674b, God sending, 711a, purpose, 504b
 Agabus, prophet, 877b, 1108a, 1125b
 Agag, Samuel and, 391a
 Agagite, 479a
Agapē (=love-feast), in Acts, 1124a
Agathos (=good), 984a
 Age, the coming, 1229a, 1252b, old, in Ecclesiastes, 621a; ages, old and new, 911a
 Agnosticism, 614a, O.T. and, 158a
 Agriculture, Palestine and, 59b, religion and, 167a
 Agrippa II, Paul and, 1129b
 Ahab, reign, 66, 425-8, Aramæans, 117b, Benhadad, 427b, Damascus, 117b, Karkar, 632a, Shalmaneser, 116a, 117b

- Ahasuerus (see Xerxes I), 478a, Esther, 477-82, Mordecai, 480b
 Ahava, 468a
 Ahaz, reign, 67b, 434, 451a, Isaiah, 434, 643b, Tiglath-pileser, 118a, 637b
 Ahaziah, reign, 429a, 432, 450a
 Ahijah, prophet, 152b
 Ahikam, 695b
 Ahimelech, 394a
 Ahitophel, 405b, Hushai, 407a
 Ahmose I, 109a
 Ai, defeat and capture, 349-50
 Aijalon, Valley of, 56a
 Akaba, Gulf of, 52a
 Akiba, Rabbi, 840a
 Alcohol, forbidden, 285b
 Alexander the Great, 112a, 192b, 324a, 755a, 750b, 826b, Greek language, 880b, Habakkuk, 804, Xerxes, 757b
 Alexandria, 187b, 193a, LXX, 103b, N.T. criticism, 885a
 Alexandrian apocalyptic, 191, Greek N.T. text, 861a, N.T. manuscripts, 861b
 Allegorical interpretation, 123a, 885a, Song of Songs, 622a
 Allegory, body and members, 1187, Ezekiel's, 723, 724b, 729, 735-6, in Hebrews, 1298a, of Ishmael and Isaac, 1218a, Jonah, 788, in N.T., 1310a, of olive trees, 1158b, parable and, 914b, of vine and branches, 1085
 Alliteration in O.T., 154b
Almah (=young woman, virgin), 643b
 Almond, Jeremiah's vision, 680b
 Almsgiving, Jesus on, 965a
 Aloes, 625b
 Alpha and Omega, 1397b
 Altar, of burnt-offering, 273b, laws of, 131b, 270a, 329, number, 131b, 355, rebuilt by exiles, 465a, in Temple, 446b
 Amalek, 304b, 337b, Israel and, 390b, location, 267a, slaughter of, 132b
 Amana, 625a
 Amarna (see Tel-el-Amarna)
 Amasa, murder of, 408b
 Amaziah, reign of, 66b, 433a, 450b, Amos, 782a, child-slaughter, 133a
 Ambassador, for Christ, 1200a, Paul as, 1293b
 Ambition, Absalom's, 405b, Jesus on, 985b, Zebedee's sons', 1013
 Amel-Marduk (see also Evil-Merodach), 111b
Amen, 858b, 881b, 883a, 884a
 Amenhotep II (Amenophis), 251a; III, 63a, 109a; IV (Ikhnaton), 60a, 63a, 109a
 American Standard Version, 982b
Am-haaretz (=people of the land), 961a, 982b
 Ammon, Amos' judgment, 778a, David overcomes, 402b, 403b, Israel and, 323a, 731a, Jeremiah on, 706a, origin, 233a, Tamar, 404
 Ammonites, 367b
 Amon, reign of, 436b, 452a
 Amon of No, god of Thebes, 705a
 Amorite, 255b, 304b
 Amorites, 140a, 322a, Israel defeated by, 322b, meaning, 360b, origin, 108b
 Amos, Hosea and, 759, message and teaching, 153a, 168a, 605a, 776b, 778, times of, 67a, work, 631a
 Amram, 253a
 Amraphel, 116a, 229b
 Anak, Anakim, 304a, 323a, 352b, 361a
 Ananias (1), Sapphira and, 927, 1100-1;
 (2) Paul's instructor, 1105a
Anathema, 1209b
 Anathoth, Jeremiah's field, 698
 Ancestor, worship of, 165b, 166a
 Ancient of Days, 1371a
 Andrew, 971a, 1000b, 1001a, 1068b
 Andronicus, 1167a
 Angel, Balaam and, 311, book in hand, 1383-4, of death, 504a, delivers apostles, 928a, 1101b, Elijah and, 426b, of Jehovah, 204a, 231a, 255a, 276b, 361b, 363, 720a, pestilence and, 118b, 411, 635b, 783a, Paul sees, 1132a, Peter delivered, 1108b
 Angelology, 204b, 845a
 Angels, 193b, 195b, apocalyptic teaching, 204-5, belief in, 982a, at birth of Jesus, 891, Christ superior to, 1300-1, of the churches, 1371b, in Daniel, 748a, fallen, 198a, 203b, 204a, 1348b, 1362, functions of, 204b, 205a, guardian, 491b, Jesus and, 999b, 1034b, law mediated by, 1214b, names of, 204b, in N.T., 1185b, in O.T., 204a, at resurrection of Jesus, 930a, 994b, 1058b, in Revelation, 1380b, 1390, women and, 225b, in Zechariah, 819b
 Anger, 365a, of God, 711a, 767
 Animals, clean and unclean, 286, creation, 506b, in Messianic age, 645a, symbolic uses of, 765a, 1386-7
 Animism, Semitic, 165-6
 Anna, Simeon and, 1035a
 Annas, examines Jesus, 901b, 1087b
 Annunciation, Mary's, 1025b, 1033b
 Anointed One, 181a, Jesus as, 898a
 Anointing, of Jesus, 869b, 900b, 1026b, 1082, 1039a, one or two? 1061b, use of oil, 275a
 Antediluvians, 120b, 225
 Anthropomorphism in O.T., 158b, 716b
 Anti-Christ, origin of idea, 846b, John on, 1352b, 1354b, in Revelation, 1383-4, 1387
 Antilegomena, 1327a
 Antinomianism, 941b, 1179, Paul on, 1247-8, Peter on, 1345b
 Antinomy, 666a, 683b
 Antioch, (1) Pisidian, Paul at, 1110-2; (2) Syrian, church at, 1115, 1107b, 1109b, Luke and, 857a, Paul and Barnabas at, 1113a
 Antiochian Gospel source, 954b
 Antiochus Epiphanes, persecutor of Jews, 71, 95a, 112b, 188b, 189, 192b, 196b, 746a, 754-5, 758
 Antipas, martyr, 1373b
 Antipater, procurator, 71b
 Antiphonal psalm, 527a
 Antithetic parallelism, 155a
 Antonia, tower of, 471a
 Anxiety, Jesus on, 967a
Aperu (=Hebrews?), 117a
 Apharsachites, 466b
 Aphrah, 793a
 Apocalypse (see also Apocalyptic), conceptions of, 843-7, meaning, 188, prophecy and, 24b, 153b, in Isaiah, 649-50, in synoptics, 869a
 Apocalyptic (see also Apocalyptic), the books, 201-13, eschatology, 846b, God in, 844-5,

- Jesus and, 846b, 911a, 955b, 1014-5, in Joel, 768b, language of, 152b, literature, 10b, 11a, 187-99, 746b, 840b, meaning, 18b, 25a, message of, 172, method, 189a, in N. T., 888b, origin, 1272a, 1364a, Paul and, 847a, prophecy and, 172a, 189-90, 844, resurrection in, 845b, themes of, 188b, in Zechariah, 819b
- Apocrypha, James' use of, 1329b, the literature, 187-99, meaning, 187, and O.T. canon, 97b, 104a, 191a, religion and, 200-213, value of, 175b
- Apollos, at Corinth, 1121b, 1171b, at Ephesus, 1121b, Hebrews written by (?), 1297b, Paul and, 940b
- Apollyon (=destruction), 1382b
- Apologists, work of, 947b
- Apostasy, 676b, Hosea on, 760a, Israel's, 681, known to God, 1305a, Paul on, 1272a, penalty of, 424, 682b, 1318-9
- Apostles, Creed, 947a, imprisoned, 1101b, the twelve, lists of, 1004b
- Apostolic, age, chronology of, 867-8, authority, 1361-3, Christianity, 933a, Constitutions, 46a, office, Paul defends his, 1197-1200, tradition, 1348a
- Appeal, law of, 332a
- Appearances, risen Christ's, 902b, 930a
- Apuleius, on the Mysteries, 851a
- Aquila, (1) husband of Priscilla, 1121b, 1167a, 1194b, 1120a; (2) translator of O.T., 104, 183a, 848a
- Arabab, wadi, described, 57b
- Arabia, Isaiah's oracle, 648b, Petraea, 785a, Sennacherib in, 118b
- Arabs, Abraham and, 231a
- Aralu* (=Hades), 173a, 733b
- Aralu* (see Aralu)
- Aram, 310a, 373b, Naharaim, 139b
- Arameans, 234b, 235a, 338a, Ahab and, 117b, early history, 60b, 61, Jacob from, 767a, influence on Israel, 65a, origin, 108b
- Aramaic language, 99a, 379a, 623a, 749b, 842b, in Daniel, 747, in Ezra, 467-8a, in N.T., 880a, in Palestine, 928b, phrases in Luke, 1045b
- Aramaisms, in Job, 487b, in O.T., 100a
- Araunah, his threshing-floor, 411, 446b
- Arbitration, 179a, 795, 827a
- Archaeology, criticism and, 115, culture and, 119b, divided kingdom and, 117-8, exile and, 118-9, history of, 114, O.T. and, 114-21, patriarchal age and, 116, restored Judah and, 118-9, the term, 114a, value of, 123b
- Archangels, names of, 204b
- Archelaus, tetrarch, 71b, 958b, 1052b
- Aretas of Damascus, 877b
- Ariel, 651a
- Arioch, 230a
- Aristarchus of Samos, 122b
- Aristeas, Letter of, 196a
- Aristobulus, household of, 1167b
- Aristotle, cosmology, 123a, God in, 164b, influence on church, 124a, on pity, 961b
- Ark, Babylonian, 120b, bulrushes, 253, contents, 386a, to Jerusalem from Kiriath-jearim, 401, 443, Philistines and, 386b, power of, 381b, 386, 401a, in sanctuary, 272b, in Temple, 420a, 447a, significance of, 302a, 385b, 386b, songs and, 156a, 157a, symbolism of, 591b, 1385a, temporary only, 179a
- Arm of the Lord, 662b, 674b
- Armageddon (see also Har-Magedon), final struggle, 1394b
- Armor, Christian, 1236-7
- Arnon river, 58b, 309a
- Arrows, use in divination, 433a
- Art, Hebrews and, 119b
- Artaxerxes, Ezra-Nehemiah and, 70b, 71a, 460a, 466a, 467b; II, 619a; III, 112a, 619a
- Artemis, temple of, 1372a
- Articles of Religion, 945b
- Asa, reign and reforms, 425a, 449
- Asahel, 399a
- Asaph psalms, 509-10, 554
- Ascension, Jesus', 1021b, 1059b, 1096b
- Ascents, psalms of, 510a, 586-93
- Asceticism, in Pastorals, 1277b, in Paul, 1258-9
- Asham* (guilt-offering), 282a
- Ashdod, 386a
- Asher, 117a, Moses' blessing, 344a
- Ashera, 166a, 425a, 775b, forbidden, 332a
- Asherim, 277a, 327a, 329b
- Asheroth (Asharoath), 362a, 366b, 421b
- Ashes for mourning, 480a
- Ashkelon, 361a
- Asharoath* (see Asheroth)
- Ashtart, 366b, 421b
- Ashurbanipal, 111b, 366b, Manasseh and, 452a
- Ashurnazirpal III, 110b, 631b
- Asia, Roman province, 1365a; Minor, early church in, 1103-15
- Asmodeus, 206a
- Ass, 506b, Balaam's, 311, symbolical, 184b, 827
- Assarion, value, 79a
- Asshur (see also Assyria), 767b
- Assonance in O.T., 154b
- Assuan, 70b
- Assumption of Moses*, 198b
- Assyria, dates for O.T. study, 111, fall of, 437a, 798, 810a, Isaiah and, 638-9, 644a, 645b, 648a, Israel and, 7a, 64-9, 148a, 168a, 435, Judah and, 67b, 650-1, Judaism and, 677a, in Messianic age, 179b, O.T. chronology and, 118a
- Assyrian Empire, history of, 631-6, inscriptions, 108a, 434a
- Assyriology, 114b
- Astarte (see also Ishtar), 119b, 166b, exiles and, 704a, worship of, 685b
- Astrologers, 658b, 750b, in Persia, 478b
- Astruc, Jean, on Pentateuch, 136b
- Athaliah, queen, 432b, 450a, her schemes, 66b
- Atheism and O.T., 158a
- Athens, Greek language and, 880b, Paul at, 1119, 1173b
- Atonement, Day of, 169b, 288-9, 841b, exile and, 690b, false ideas of, 409b, Jesus and, 906b, in O.T., 175a, 279b, meaning, 276b, money, 275a
- Attic dialect, 881a
- Attis and the Mysteries, 1341b

- Attributes of God, 160-4
Audientes (inquirers), 47a
 Augsburg Confession, 944b
 Augustine, 164a
 Aureus, value of, 78b
 Authority, of Bible, 30b, 41, 945-6, 949, of Christ, 905a, 936b, 969a, 986b, 1075-8, 1288a, 1373b, 1376b, N.T. and, 890a, religion and, 885b, of Synoptic Gospels, 873
 Authorized Version, 4b, 85
 Authorship, apocalyptic and, 189a, of epistles, 855a, of Pentateuch, 134-44
 Avarice, punished, 430b, rebuked, 1324b
 Aven (=On), 777b
 Axe, Elisha recovers, 430b
 Azariah, Asa and, 449a, Prayer of Azariah, 194a
 Azazel, scape-goat and, 289a
 Azekah, 699b
Azubah (=forsaken), 672b
- B
- B, Codex Vaticanus, 860b, contents, 862b
 Baal, 66a, 166b, Jehovah and, 159b, 161, 364a, 762; -berith, 365b; -Hazor, 56a; -peor, 324a, 763b; -worship and Jehovah, 684a, 776a, 811b
 Baalim, 366b
 Baalism, 159a, Israel and, 360a, 361b, 426a
 Baalzebub (see Beelzebub), 429a
 Baasha, reign of, 425a
Baba bathra, 135a
 Babel, tower of, 228a
 Babylon (see also Babylonia), Assyria and, 69a, fall predicted, 658b, God's instrument, 692b, Genesis and, 127a, Isaiah's oracles on, 645, 648a, Israel and, 69, Jeremiah's prophecies on, 706-8, Jewish community in, 702-4, 790, Judah and, 798-9, rulers of, 749a, Rome as, 1389a, 1391b
 Babylonia (see also Babylon), civilization of, 145-6, dates for O.T. study, 111, influence, 116b, Israel and, 148a, Jews in, 666b, literature of, 120a, O.T. and, 115b
 Babylonia (see also Babylonia), cosmology, 123b, 170b, creation story, 120, exile, 548-9, flood story, 120, gods, 121a, Job, 487b, language, 99a, 100b, mythology, 228a, origins, 108a, psalms, 513b, war-methods, 805-6
 Backgrounds, N.T., 10-12, O.T., 5-7
 Backsliding, Jesus on, 869b, 976a, peril of, 1307-8, Peter on, 1349a, warning against, 1301b
 Bacon, B. W., dates in Paul, 878
 Bagoas, letter of, 112a, 119a
 Balaam, his blessing, 155b, 309-12
 Balaamites at Pergamum, 1373b
 Balak, Balaam and, 309-12
 Baldness, 690a, reproach, 429b
 Balm of Gilead, 687a
 Balsam, 401a, 625b
 Ban (= "devoted"), 133a, 297b, 320a, 327a, 334a, 346b, Achan, 350a
 Banias (=Caesarea-Philippi), 56b
 Baptism, "for the dead," 1192, Jesus', 12b, 874-5, 999, John's, 892b, Paul and, 1171b, 1149a, 1150a, 1215b, 1236a, 1258a, as "sealing," 1381a
 Baptismal confession, 947a
 Baptist, Johnⁿ (see also John Baptist), words of, 869b
 Bar Kochba, 78a, 840a
 Barabbas, Jesus and, 902a, 993b, 1056b, 1088b
 Barak, 357b, story of, 362-3
 Barclay, Robert, on the Spirit, 946a
 Bar-Jesus, magian, 1110a
 Barnabas, author of Hebrews (?), 1297b, Paul and, 939b, 1105b, 1107b, 1109-11
 Bartimaeus, Jesus heals, 899b, 1014a
 Baruch, (1) Jeremiah's secretary, 700, 704b; (2) Books of Baruch, I, 195a; II, 199a; III, 199b, Messiah in, 210, resurrection in, 211b
 Barzillai, David and, 408a
 Bashan, fame of, 58a, "kine" of, 779b, occupied, 309b, Og and, 323b
 Bashmuric Coptic N.T., 865b
 Bastards, 335b
 Bath, measure, 79b
 Bathsheba, 416a
 Baur on Philippians, 1239
 Bear, Daniel's vision, 753b
 Beast, in Revelation, 1364b, 1365b, 1386-7, 1392a
 Beasts, Daniel's vision, 753b
 Beatitudes, 869b, in Luke, 1037-8, significance, 911a, 960-2
 Beautiful Gate, lame man at, 927
 Bedan (=Barak), 102a
 Bedouin, 165b, 231a
 Beelzebub, Jesus and, 896a, 926a, 972a, 1004-5
Be'er (=well), 309a
 Beersheba, Jacob's vision, 246b, meaning, 139a, 234a, 236b, site, 780b
 Beggar, blind, Jesus heals, 1052a
 Behavior, religion and (see also Conduct, Ethics), 1329b Behemoth, 507b, 555b
 Beisan (see Beth-Shean)
Bel and the Dragon, 194b
 Belial, 384a, 1200b, sons of, 330a
 Beliar, 206a
 Belief, significance of, 947a
 Belis river, 54a
 Belit, goddess, 801b
 Beloved disciple, identity, 1065, 1092a
 Belshazzar, feast of, 752
 Belteshazzar, 748b
 Ben 'Azzai, O.T. canon, 98a
 Benediction, priestly, 300b
Benedictus, 279a
 Bengel, Greek N.T., 861a
 Benhadad of Damascus, 66a, 110, 425a, 427b, death, 431b
 Benjamin, birth, 242a, Joseph and, 245b, Moses' blessing, 343b
 Berœa, Paul at, 1119a
 Bethabarah, John baptizes at, 1068a
 Bethany, Jesus at, 1043b, Jesus anointed at, 900b, 1016, 1082
 Beth-aven, 763a
 Bethel, Amos at, 779b, 782a, Jacob at, 237b, 241b, location, 56a, meaning, 139a, sanctuary at, 65a, 677
 Bethesda, miracle at, 1072
 Beth-horon, 351b

- Bethlehem, Messiah and, 182b, of Zebulon, 368b
 Bethphage, 985b
 Bethsaida, (1) Julius, 1041a; (2) on Sea of Galilee, 1041a; doom of, 974a
 Beth-Shean (Scythopolis), 55a, Egyptians and, 60, excavations at, 114b, 117a
 Beth-Shemesh, 56a
 Bethulah (= virgin), 643b
 Betrothal, Jewish custom, 957b
 Beulah, 672b
 Bezalel, 275a
 Bible (see also Scriptures), authority of, 30b, 41, authors of, 40b, book of religion, 33, character of, 39a, Christ the criterion, 28b, 29a, 40a, Christian use of, 32-8, church and, 27a, confirmation of, 30, contents, 15a, devotional manual, 40a, didactic elements, 25a, discrepancies, 131-2, diversity, 39a, 42b, divine character, 26-31, divisions, 15, drama, 22, English translations, 80-7, ethical interest, 34, historic record, 853, human element, 26, 42a, inconsistencies, 464b, inerrancy, 26-7, 101-2, influence of, 80, inspiration, 27b, 129a, interpretation, 19a, 26, 40a, Jesus and, 35-7, letters, 25b, library of religion, 15-18, 39a, literature, 3a, 19-25, 39a, 310b, meaning, 3, misuse, 41a, modern view of, 48b, permanence, 50b, poetry, 23, preaching and, 39-44, printed first, 860b, prose, 21, Protestant view, 41, 47b, 944-6, reading in public, 43b, reflects life, 33, Reformation and, 136a, 885b, religion and, 3, religious education, 45-51, revelation, 3, 30a, 39b, scholarship and, 41-2, science and, 27b, 122-8, Semitic book, 165a, stories in, 21, study of, 3-14, "tendency" in, 32, trustworthiness, 26-7, 107, unity, 39b, 853b, vernacular versions, 86-7, visions in, 24b, 25a
 Biblical, criticism, 7-8, 85b, 124a, 885-90, Greek, 880b, ideals and Jesus, 35-6, literature, types of, 20b, preaching, 39-44
 Bildad, 490b, first speech, Job's reply, 492-3, second speech, Job's reply, 496-8, third speech, Job's reply, 500-1
 Bilingualism, Jewish, 928b, in N.T., 881a, in Palestine, 864b
 Binding and loosing, 982b, 1090b
 Bird, clean and unclean, 286, protection, 334b, ritual, 280a
 Birth, Jesus', 891-2, date of Jesus' birth, 874, new, 1069b
 Birthright, Jacob and Esau, 236
 Bishops, Bible, 85a, choice and power in early church, 947, 1125a, 1239a, 1277-8, 1281a, 1359
 Bit-Adini, 733a
 Black horse and rider, 1379b
 Blasphemy, crime, 295a, Jesus charged with, 1076
 Bleek, F., on Pentateuch, 136b
 Blemishes in offerings, 332a
 Blessedness, meaning, 960b
 Blessing, of Isaac, 236b, of Moses, 343-4, of patriarchs, 155b
 Blind, Jesus cures, 870a, 923a, 970b, 1010b, 1078b
 Blindness, moral, 656b, Syrians', 431a
 Blood, covenant, 74b, feud, 317, 405, money, 75a, prohibition, 283b, 290b, revenge, 75, 133b, 333b, 346b, 354b, 496a, rites, 165b, 166a, significance, 74b, 224b, 226b, 279b, 329b, symbolism, 1255b, 1315-6, 1341a
 Boanerges, meaning, 971a
 Boastfulness, folly of, 543a
 Boaz, the native, 380a, Ruth and, 377-8
 Body, church as Christ's, 176a, 938b, 1226a, 1230b, natural and spiritual, 1192-3, Paul's allegory of, 1187, resurrection, 173b, 211, 1193, sanctity of, 1179, 1247b
 Bohairic Coptic N.T., 865a
 Boils, golden, 286b, plague, 261a
 Bond, meaning, 314b, religious, 684a
 Bondage to law, 1218a
 Bones, Ezekiel's vision, 740
 Book, angel with, 1383b, of Covenant, 139, 143a, 146a, 269-71, 320b, of destiny, 1378-80, of Jashar, 21a, 100b, 157a, of life, 276b, 1375b, 1395b, of remembrance, 545a, 553a, 1043a, 1248a, 1395b, of Wars of Jehovah, 21a, 100b, 157a
 Booths, 623b, 783b, Feast of, 294b, 331b, 766b
 Borrowing, 330b
 Bottle, goatskin, 1003a
 Boundaries, tribal, 316b
 Bowls, John's vision, 1390-1
 Boxwood (teashshur tree), 732a, 735b, 736a
 Boycott of early Christians, 1388a
 Bozrah, 778a
 Branch, Messianic title, 183a, 184a, 641b, 699a, 820a, 822a
 Brazen serpent, 308b
 Brazier, 700b
 Bread, of God, 293a, of life, 897a, 1074, of mourning, 670b, 765b
 Breastplate, 273b, 274a
 Brescia Bible, 103a
 Brevity of life, 567
 Bribery, 331b, Amos denounces, 778a
 Brick, Egyptian, 252b, 258b
 Bride, Israel as Jehovah's, 682a, 723, of Lamb, 1394a
 British, Lessons Council, 50a, Museum, MSS. in, 102b
 Brook of Egypt (= wadi el-Arish), 745a
 Broom (= uniper), 502a
 Brotherhood, Christian, 1005b, 1154a, 1355a, Jesus and, 908a, 909, 982b
 Brotherly, kindness in Proverbs, 613a, love in N.T., 1220, 1324b
 Bruce, A. B., on parables, 917a
 Budde on prophetic canon, 95a
 Building, metaphor for church, 1230b, 1341b
 Bul (= Marchesvan), 77b
 Bull, images, 764b, 765a, symbol of Jehovah, 775b, worship, 414b, 424a
 Burden (= oracle), 645b, 694a, burden-bearing, 1220b
 Burial customs, 76, 410a, 741b, 994a
 Burney on fourth Gospel, 880a
 Burning bush, 254b
 Burnt-offering, 169b, 284a, regulations, 279, 282b, significance, 780b
 Bushel, measure, 79b
 Business, religion and, 666b

Byblos, inscription at, 115b
 Byzantine Greek N.T., text 861a

C

- C, Codex Ephræmi, 860b, contents, 862b, 863a
 Cæsar, "things of," 900a, worship, 1295a
 Cæsarea, 54a, in Acts, 1106b, Luke and, 857a, Paul at, 1125b
 Cæsarea-Philippi, 56b, Peter's confession at, 897b, 980, 1010-1
 Caiaphas, Jesus and, 901b, 1082a, 1088a
 Cain, punishment of, 75a, 224
 Calamities, apocalyptic, 1382a, for sin, 710
 Caldron, Ezekiel's vision, 680b, 730
 Caleb, 322b, 355a, campaign of, 360b, Hebron, 353b, spy, 303b
 Calendar, Jewish, 262b, 294b
 Calf, bull-image, 783a, golden, 275, of Samaria, 765a
 Caligula and Temple, 1387b
 Call, the divine, 388b, Ezekiel's, 643a, 715b, prophetic, 150, 151, 167b
 Calmet on the Pentateuch, 137b
 Calneh, 781a
 Calvin and Bible, 885b, 944-5
 Cambyases the Persian, 112a, 460a, 813a
 Camp of Israel, 299
 Cana, marriage at, 1068b
 Canaan (see also Palestine, Holy Land), conquest, 62-3, 316a, 346-52, 357, 360-1, division, 353-5, features, 328, influence on Israel, 166-7, name, 52a, settlement, 357, 360-1
 Canaanite(s), 139b, 140a, 141b, 255b, 304, extermination, 6b, meaning, 360b, for merchant, 724b, 812a, origin, 108b, religion, 166b
 Canals of Babylon, 594a
 Candace, queen, 1104b
 Candlestick(s), in sanctuary, 294b, 419b, Zechariah's vision, 822b
 Canneh, 733a
 Canon, apocrypha and, 97b, meaning, 91a, N.T., Harnack on, 948b, O.T., 191a, 99-107, permanence of O.T., 133b, ratification of O.T., 97-8
 Canticles, 622
 Capernaum, doom on, 974, Jesus and, 12a, 960a, 1000b
 Caphtor, 705a, 783b
 Captivity, 69-70, dates, 111a, Isaiah and, 654a, Jeremiah predicts, 694b
 Carcass, unclean, 286b
 Carchemish, battle of, 69, 111, 798b, 805b
 Carmel, Baals and, 167a, Elijah at, 148b, 426, site, 54a, 55
 Carnal man, Paul on, 1175b
 Carpenter, Jesus as, 892b, 1007a
 Carpozov on Pentateuch, 137b
 Carthage, church council, 41b
 Casiphia, 468a
 Cassia, 275a
 Casuistry, Jesus on, 990a
 Catastrophe, for sin, 811-13
 Catechetical instruction, 1220b
 Catherine, Saint, monastery, 862b, 864b
 Catholic, church and N.T., 885b, epistles, 1327a
 Caul, 767a
 Cedar, allegory in Ezekiel, 724b
 Celsus on N.T. Greek, 881b
 Censer and prayers, 1382a
 Censoriousness, Jesus on, 967b
 Census, 881b, David's, 133a, 444a, of Israel, 298-9, 312-3, pestilence and, 411, of Quirinius in Luke, 874b, 1023b
 Centurion, servant restored, 1038b, son restored, 923b
 Cephas (= Peter), 883a, 1004b, 1171b
 Ceremonialism, false, 1325, Jesus on, 897, 905a, 907b, 1008a, morality and, 765a
 Cerinthus the gnostic, 1350b
 Certainty, Christian, 1354a, Scripture and, 949b
 Chaldeans, empire, 437, Habakkuk and, 804, magi, 748b
 Chance, life and, 618a, 620
 Character, building, 968-9, childlike, 981-2, Christian, 962b, parables of, 918a
 Chariot, race, 1247b, Zechariah's vision, 823b
 Charity in judgment, 1336b
 Charles, R. H., on Revelation, 884, 1368
Chasidim, 195b, 198a
 Chastisement, 491b, 663a
 Chastity, laws of, 335, Paul on, 1177-82
 Chebar, 715b
 Chedorlaomer, king, 230a
 Cheerfulness, 612a
Chemarim, 811b
 Chemosh, Moabite god, 166b, 312b, 367b, 422a, 430a
 Cherithites (= Philistines), 731b
 Cherubim, 223b, 272b, 385b, 418a, in Revelation, 1377b
 Cheyne, on Ecclesiasticus and canon, 97b, on Isaiah, 630b
 Child, -birth and uncleanness, 286b, Isaiah's prophecy, 182a, -likeness, 1012a, -sacrifice, 330a, 368a, 723b, -training.
 Children, Hebrew instruction, 45, of God, 908, Jesus and, 899b, 974a, 981-2, 984a, 1052a, O.T. and, 174b, parents and, 610b, 1236b
 Chinnereth (= Sea of Galilee), 57a
 Chislew, month, 77b
 Chittim, land of, 649a
 Chium, 781a
 Chloe and Corinth, 1169a
 Choices, God's, 268, 392a
 Chorazin, doom of, 974a
 Chosen of God, 1226a, Israel, 681a, 1155
 Christ (see also Jesus, Messiah, Son), Adam and, 1147-8, Bible interpretation and, 28b, 29a, centrality, 47a, cosmical significance, 1253-5, crucified and Law, 936, 1172-5, demons and, 1383a, foundation, 1175b, high-priest, 1305-12, -idea, origin of, 37b, image of God, 1198a, 1253, Isaiah and, 672a, 664-5, Jewish sacrifices and, 1296b, 1317, Judge, 1349, 1379-80, King, 1394b, life of, 891-903, Lord, 887a, miracle of, 929, N.T. interpretations, 39b, N.T. portrait, 859a, in O.T., 9b, 181-6, Paul and, 37-8, Person and work in Luke, 1025-33, redeems from law, 1216, relation to God, 1072b, 1084-5, resurrection, 930, resurrection in Paul, 1190-3,

- return of, in fourth Gospel, 1084-5, return of, in Paul, 1182a, revelation of God, 29a, 886b, 1350a, sacrifice of, 1314-7, sonship of in fourth Gospel, 1091a, sovereignty, 1228a, Spirit, in Paul, 1197b, 1243a, suffering, 981a, 1302b, sufficiency, 1220-1, superiority to angels, 1300-1, superiority to Moses, 1303b, supremacy, 1296b, triumph of, 1395-8, uniqueness, 921b, use of O.T., 41a, and "wisdom," 1253b, wisdom of God, 1172b
- Christian, character, Paul on, 1266b, conduct, Paul on, 1268-9, 1290, education, its history, 46-7; Christian ethics, Jude on, 1361-3, Paul on, 1160-4, 1234-6, 1259-61, Peter on, 1345, in Thessalonians, 1265a; Christian experience, in Colossians, 1250-1, and theology, 1255-7, Paul on, 1228-9, life, described, 1341b, life, sinless, 1148-50, man, 949-50, perfection, in John, 1352a, race, metaphor of, 1322, society, Paul on, 1232-6, name, 1107b, Son of God, 1153-4
- Christianity, applications of, 1290, backgrounds, 839-52, church and, 1351, corporate character, 938a, dependence on documents, 45-6, divineness, 1347, doctrinal, 944, essence and accidents, 949b, experience and, 946-8, in Galatians, 1208, Jewish church and, 148a, O.T. and, 124a, 853b, 1104b, 1110b, 1201a, 1295-6, 1300a, 1317-8, origin, 1098a, race prejudice and, 1106-7, Temple and, 446
- Christmas, time of, 1034b
- Christology, in Colossians, 1224, 1250-1, 1253-6, in Ephesians, 1224, in fourth Gospel, 1073b, 1074b, 1079b, 1085a, in Hebrews, 1300, Paul's, 1244-5, Peter's, 1347a, in Q, 1043b, in Thessalonians, 1265a
- Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah and, 96a, religious values, 452
- Chronology, N.T., 874-9, O.T., 108-13
- Church, Bible and, 27a, body of Christ, 176a, 1226a, 1228, 1254b, Christianity and, 1351, in Colossians, 942a, disorders in, 1177-9, disorders at Corinth, Paul on, 1184-6, divine, 26b; church, early, expansion of, 877a, in Jerusalem, 1096-1103, in Roman Empire, 1115-34, in Syria and Asia Minor, 1103-5; church, in Ephesians, 1222b, founding of, 877a, in Matthew, 955a, 982b, mediæval theory, 47a, militant and triumphant, 1380a, new Israel, 933a, orders and offices, 1277-8, organization in Pastorals, 1275-6, sphere of salvation, 937-9, state and, Paul on, 1161, world and, 789b
- Chuzza, Herod's steward, 1040a
- Cimmerian (see Scythian)
- Circumcision, 193b, in Acts, 1107b, 1113-4, gospel and, 934b, Moses' failure, 257b, origin, 166a, 232a, 348b, Paul and, 940b, 1141b, 1210b, symbolism of, 1257b
- Cities of refuge, 317, 325a, 333-4, 354b
- Citizenship, heavenly, 1342a
- City of God, visions of, Ezekiel's, 742-5, John's, 1396-8, Zechariah's, 821
- Civic duty enjoined, 824
- Claudius Lysias, Paul and, 1128
- Clay, potter's, 691a
- Clean and unclean "meats," 1162
- Cleansing of Temple, Jesus', 900a, 1061b
- Cleanthes the Stoic, 122b
- Clement of Rome, 1239b, author of Hebrews (?), 1299a
- Clericus, 136b
- Climate of Palestine, 58-9
- Cloud of fire, 301a
- Code(s), Deuteronomic, 139a, 318a, 319a, 329-39, differences in, 139a, Hebrew, 146, 269b, O.T., 169b, 321, Priestly, 139a, Sinaitic, 325
- Codex, 860a, Alexandrinus, 104a, Bezae, 860b, Ephraemi, 104a, Sinaiticus, 104a, Vaticanus, 104a
- Coin, in fish's mouth, 923b, parable of lost, 1048b
- Coinage in Bible, 78
- Colet, 82a, 83a
- Collection, Paul's, for Jerusalem poor, 1166b, 1194a, 1201-2
- Colonies, Roman, 11a
- Colossæ, heresy at, 1250
- Colossians, epistle to, authorship, 1223, message, 942a
- Comfort, ministry of, 961a
- Comforter (= Paraclete), 1085a
- Commandment(s), greatest, 988b, the Ten, 325
- Commission, Jesus' last, 926b, 995b, 1096b, of the Twelve, 971-3
- Common (=unclean), 285b
- Commonwealth of nations, 827
- Communism, early Christian, 933b, 1023b, 1098a, 1100a, 1234b
- Community, the Christian, 1342a
- Commutation of vows, 297
- Competentes (=mature candidate), 47a
- Compilation, of O.T. historical books, 92a, 249b, 358, 381a, 412-3, 439, 463, of Pentateuch, 138-9, 142-3
- Compiler, the O.T., 412b
- Complutensian Polyglot, 103a, 104a
- Compromise, dangers, 1373b, 1388b, place of, 1115b
- Concord, Formula of, 944b
- Conduct (see also Behavior, Ethics), Christian, 1342, John on, 1374, Jude on, 1361-3, Paul on, 1268-9, 1276b, 1290, Peter on, 1345, 1348; conduct, of church officials, 1281, in early church, 46b, religion and, 1329b, right, 608a
- Confession, of Christ, 972, earliest Christian, 856a, in Ezra-Nehemiah, 469a, 474a, of faith, 858b, Peter's, 897b, 980, of sin, 542, 712a, 1337b
- Confidence, in God, 450a, 516, 520b, 545, 547-8, loss of, 687a
- Congregation, the, meaning, 317b, 375a
- Conjectural emendation, 106
- Conquest of Canaan, 62-3, 316a, 346-52, 357, 360-1, stories of, 346a
- Conscience, 670a, an evil, 495b, God and, 340, heathen and, 1141a, Herod's, 978b, in O.T., 619b, Stoic term, 850b
- Consecration, meaning, 274b, 284a, 373a, of priests, 274
- Consensus fidelium, 41b
- Conservatism, theological, 123

- Consolation, Book of, Jeremiah's, 697-8
 Constancy of God, 665b
 Context, value of, 6a, 7b
 Conversion, in Acts, 1098a, of Cornelius, 1106b, of Ethiopian eunuch, 1104, of Lydia, 1117a, meaning, 771b, of Paul, 934-6, 1104b,
 Paul on, 1257b, of Philippian jailer, 1117b,
 of Sergius Paulus, 1110a
 Co-operation, power of, 380b
Cophinos (=basket), 1009b
 Coptic versions of N.T., 865a
 Cor, measure, 79b
 Corban, oath, meaning, 1008b
 Corinth, city and church, 1169b, disorders in church, 1177-9, Paul at, 940a, 1120-1, 1169, 1173b
 Corinthian, church, parties in, 1171-7, Paul and, 1200-1, epistles, 855b, messages of epistles, 940-1
 Cornelius, converted, 1106b, Peter and, 928-9, 934a
 Corner-stone, Jesus as, 1099b
 Corporate, Christianity, 938a, responsibility,
 403b, 605b
 Corpse, exposure of, 334b
 Corruption, Amos on, 775b, treatment of, 330a
 Corvee, in O.T., 408b, 420b, 446b
 Cosmogony, Genesis and, 126-7, N.T. and,
 854a
 Cosmology, Hebrew, 783a, of O.T., 170b, primitive, 527a, religion and, 122b
 Council of Jerusalem on "meats," 1211
 Counsel of Proverbs, 606-8
 Couplet in Hebrew poetry, 602b
 Courage, Jeremiah's, 679a, Jonah's, 789a
 Courses, priestly, 1033b
 Court, law, and Christians, 1178, of tabernacle,
 273b, of Temple, 418a, 447a
 Covenant(s), 175a, 286a, with Abraham, 230, 231, Book of the, 139, 146a, 269-71, 320b, in Christ, 906b, 1197a, 1214a, 1311b, 1313,
 Ezra-Nehemiah, 474a, with God, 656b,
 at Horeb, 325, with Israel, 62, 178a, 180b,
 Jeremiah's new, 168a, 179a, 180b, 698a,
 Jesus establishes new, 901a, and Jewish religion, 932b, kinds of, 74b, of king with people, 65a, meaning, 259a, 324b, 503a, 853a, Mosaic, 688a, national, 271b, new and old compared, 1323-4, with Noah, 226b, salt, 280a, Zadokite, 193a
 Coverdale, Miles, 84
 Covetousness, 269a, 793b, rebuked, 1284b
 Cranmer's Bible, 84b
 Create (= bārā), meaning, 127a
 Creation, accounts of, 219-22, Babylonian story, 120, 193b, Christ and, 1254, God and, 160b, of man, 203b, narrative, 138b, in Proverbs, 605a, source of, 1319b, stories, differences in, 139b
 Creative power, God's, 162a, John's vision of, 1377-9
 Creator, praise for, 599-601, Jehovah as,
 655a
 Creed(s), Jewish, 326a, in N.T., 1245a, 1303b, 1334a, relation to N.T., 885b
 Crescents, 365a
 Crete, archaeology and, 114b, morality of,
 1289b, Paul and Titus at, 1288-9
 Crime, legislation, 271a, 333
 Crisis, history and, 1370a, kingdom and, 1397b
 Crispus, 1120b, 1171b
 Criticism, archaeology and, 115, Bible and,
 7-8, biblical, 124a, legitimacy of, 129, meaning, 129a, 886a, methods, 653-4, of N.T., 885-90, 1092, of N.T., example, 1368, of N.T., forms of, 887, of N.T., results,
 889-90, of O.T., 129-33, of O.T., example,
 804, 825, of Pentateuch, 136-7, preaching and, 42a, textual, 105-7, types of, 129-33, value of, 310a, 956a
 Crocodile, 507b, symbol of Egypt, 734b
 Cressus and Cyrus, 458b
 Cross, bearing the, 902b, 1041a, Jesus predicts, 1027a, and O.T., 175b, 176a, Paul on, 931-2, 936, 1170-2, 1143b, 1147b, seven words from, 1057a
 Crown of life, 1332a
 Crucifixion, date of, 875b, Jesus', 902, 993-4, 1019-20, 1056-8
 Cubit, measurement, 79
 Cults, influence on Israel, 436b, 451b, N.T.
 and, 889a
 Culture, archaeology and, 119b, religion and,
 611-13
 Cuneiform writing, 100b, 114b, 230a, Moses
 and, 115
 Cup, symbolical, 557b, 730a, 1013b, of wrath,
 694b, 705b, 807b, 1394b
 Cupbearer, official, 470a
 Curetarian Syriac N.T., 865a
 Curse(s), 372b, of disobedience, 339, of the Law, 1213b
 Cursive MSS., meaning, 860a
 Cushan-rishathaim, 362a
 Cuttings in flesh, 705a
 Cybele, 1219a
 Cylinder of Sennacherib, 118a
 Cynicism, 197a, apocalyptic and, 190b
 Cyprian, theory of church, 947-8
 Cyprus, mission to, 1109b
 Cyrus, 111, 112a, 458b, anointed, 168b, 178b, 181a, Babylon and, 648a, 749a, chosen of God, 657b, decrees of, 118b, 453, exiles and,
 458b, 463, Isaiah and, 7b, 654a, Jews and,
 70b, Messiah and, 209a, rise of, 655a

D

- D, Codex Bezae, 860b, contents, 862-3; described, 863a
 D, O.T. document, 137a, 138, 139-41, date of,
 142-3, style, 140b, theology of, 141a
 Dagon, the god, 371b, 386a
 Dahse, on Pentateuch, 137b
 Damascus, Ahab and, 117b, Amos' judgment on, 777b, capture of, 67b, fall of, 111a, 647a,
 Israel and, 65b, Jeremiah's oracle on, 706b,
 Jeroboam II captures, 776b, origin of, 61a,
 Paul at, 935b, 939a, 1105a
 Damascus, Pope, 105a
 Dan, 141b, Moses' blessing, 344a, migrations of, 63b, sanctuary at, 65a
 Dance, sacred, 401a
 Daniel, angels in, 204a, apocalyptic and, 153b, apocryphal "additions" to, 194, 746a,
 Babylon and, 696b, and canon, 94b, 96b,

- 148b, eschatology and, 172b, "173b, interpretation of, 148b, judgment in, 206b, son of man in, 185a
- Danites, 358a, sanctuary of, 372-3, spies, 373
- Dante, the white rose, 1398
- Daric, gold, silver, 78a
- Darius, decree of, 195a, inscription, 478b; Darius "the Mede," 753a; Darius I., 460a, 816b, Haggai and, 815a, Temple and, 466-7
- Darkness, plague, 262a, symbolic, 1252b
- Dates, of apocalyptic, 191b, N.T. and contemporary history, 874-9, O.T. events and literature, 108-113
- Dathan, challenges Moses, 305
- Daughter(s), of Jerusalem, 623b, legislation, 317b, of Zion, 710b
- David, Abner and, 75, Absalom and, 404-8, anointed, 391b, ark and, 401, 443a, career of, 147b, character, 381a, 395-6, 406b, 408a, 409, 445-6, Chronicler's portrait, 442, death, 445a, dynasty, 182a, 416b, Goliath and, 392a, greatness of, 64, idealized, 442b, Jerusalem and, 400, 442b, Jesus as David's son, 899b, 956b, 989a, 1034b, Joab and, 75, Jonathan and, 392, 393, king of Judah, 399a, king of united Israel, 64a, 400a, lamentations of, 157a, last days, 415b, last words, 410, numbers people, 133a, organizer, 444b, Philistines and, 400b, prayer of, 402a, Psalms and, 171b, 512b, 580a, religious history and, 453, Ruth and, 378b, Saul and, 391b, 394-5, sacrifice of, 131b, story of, 391-411, 442-6, Temple and, 401-2, 443b, Uriah and, 403, wars of, 402b
- Day of Atonement, 169b, ritual of, 288-9; of Jehovah (or of Lord), 172a, 180b, 206b, 649, 844b, 911a, described, 1380, in Amos, 780b, 782b, in apocalyptic, 1364a, in Habakkuk, 807b, in Jeremiah, 683, 697a, in Joel, 769, 771, in Obadiah, 786, in Zephaniah, 809-14
- Days of creation, 193b
- Daysman, 493a
- Deacon in N.T., 1277-8, 1281b
- Dead, "blessedness" of Christian, 1389b, Jesus raises, 923a, rites of, 166a
- Deaf, Jesus cures, 923a
- Death, abolished in Christ, 1303a, of Christ, saving significance, 1190b, 1302-3, deliverance from, 496b, 565, destruction of, 179b, 650a, 1193, 1368b, of Jesus, 906a, Job desires, 490b, 492a, metaphor of, 725b, negation of life, 174b, oblivion in, 620a, Paul on sin and, 1148, as "Pestilence," 1380a, second, 1395b, sin and, 203b, 935a, sleep of, 557b, untimely, 619a, wicked and, 497a
- Deborah, 357b, 362-3, song of, 5b, 7a, 155b, 157a, 362-3
- Debt, law on, 474, as "trespass," 966a
- Debtor, Paul a, 1138b
- Decalogue, 268-9, early authority of, 92a, value of, 144b
- Decapolis, 1006b, miracle at, 1009a
- Decian persecution, 1338a
- Dedan, 733a
- Dedication, 402b, of gifts, 279b, of Temple, 419-21, 447-8, of walls of Jerusalem, 475a
- "Deep," the, in O.T., 124-5
- Defilement, ceremonial, Jesus on, 990b, from corpse, 300b, 307a
- Deism, 202a
- Deissmann, on fig-tree, 923b, on N.T. Greek, 881b
- Deity, conceptions of, 302b; female deities, 159a
- Delaiah and Egyptian Jews, 119a
- Delilah and Samson, 371
- Delitzsch on Isaiah, 630a
- Deliverance, divine, 808, Paul's by Christ, 935a, prayer for, 527-8, 560, 573, 711b, from sin, 177a, thanksgiving for, 583, 587-8
- Delphian inscription, 876b
- Deluge (see also Flood) story, Babylonian, 114b
- Demetrius and Paul, 1123a
- Democracy, the Christian, 1333a, 1355a
- Demon(s), 193b, 195b, 198a, apocalyptic and, 205-6, belief in, 165-6, 1001a, casting out, 922b, Christ conquers, 1383a, the Fall and, 205b, functions of, 206a, Jesus and, 997a, 1006, 1117a, Jesus exorcises, 925a, possession, 894a, 925b
- Demoniac, Jesus heals, 869a, 896b, 923a
- Demonic horsemen, in Revelation, 1382-3
- Denarius, 78b, 881b, 963b
- Denney on risen Lord eating, 923b
- Denying one's self, 972b
- Dependableness of God, 657a
- De Rossi's O.T. variants, 103b
- Depravity of man, 203b
- Desert life, 73-6
- Despair described, 711a
- Destiny of righteous and wicked, 836
- Destruction by God, 494b
- Determinism, 199b
- Deuteronomic, code, 139a, 329-39, character of, 92, 146, Egyptian Jews and, 119a, influence of, 93a, Josiah's reform and, 437, 686b; covenant, 175a, reform, 169a, school, 358b, viewpoint, 345b
- Deuteronomy, 134, Josiah and, 68-9, name, 318a
- Development, Newman on, 39b
- Devil, 206a, in O.T., 820a
- Devoted thing, 297b, 306b, 349a, Achan, 350a
- Devotional literature, 17a
- Dew, symbolical, 592b
- De Wette on Pentateuch, 136b
- Diabolos (= Satan), 959b
- Diadem, 502a
- Dialects and N.T. Greek, 881a
- Dialogue in Job, 485b
- Diana at Ephesus, 1123a
- Diaspora (see also Dispersion), described, 1328b
- Diatessaron, Tatian's, 864b
- Diatribes, 883b, in James, 1329a
- Diblah (= Riblah), 719a
- Didachē, 45b
- Didactic, in Bible, 25a, psalm, 533a
- Diligence, 611b
- Dillmann on Isaiah, 630a, on law and prophets, 93b
- Dinah, outrage on, 241
- Dionysius Exiguus, monk, 874a

- Dionysos, cult of, 1238a, ecstasy and, 389a, god of wine, 1375b
 Diotrepheas, insubordination of, 1359
 Dirge, 156a, 780a
 Disciples, Jesus' first, 893b, 1000b, 1068b, miracles of, 926-7, 971a
 Discipleship, conditions, 972b, cost, 899a, 970a, 1041b, 1046b, 1048a
 Discipline, 327a, necessity of, 1323a, Paul on, 1269b, 1277a
 Discrepancies, Bible, 131-2, 930a, in Flood narrative, 139a, in legal literature, 139a, in Pentateuch, 138-9
 Disease, Jesus heals, 922, theories of, 893b
 Dishonesty, commercial, 782b, 796b
 Disobedience, Adam's, Paul on, 1147-8, curses of, 296, 339, Israel's, 577, results of, 688a, Saul's, 391, warning against, 1305
 Disobedient prophet, 424
 Dispersion (see also Diaspora), 193a, 847, apocrypha and, 188a, Jews of, 195b, 196a, literature and, 190b, 202-4, restored, 828a
 Dissipation denounced, 642a
 Distich, 155a
 Divergencies in Bible, 303b, 358
 Dives and Lazarus, 1030a, 1049b
 Divided kingdom, archaeology and, 117-8, history of, 423-35
 Divination, 396b, Chaldaean, 749a, condemned, 763a, in Ezekiel, 728a, in O.T., 827b
 Divine, names, 138, power, 160, unity, 160a
 Divinity of Christ, 929, 937b, in 2 Peter, 1347a
 Division, of Canaan, 313a, in church, evils of, 1335b, 1360b, in Corinthian church, 1171-7, of Hebrew Kingdom, 65
 Divorce, Jesus on, 899a, 910a, 963-4, 983b, laws, 336a, Malachi on, 832b, 834-5, Paul on, 1181b
 Docetism, 1089b, 1303a, gnostics and, 1350b, Jesus' resurrection and, 903a
 Doctrine, defined, 944a, in fourth Gospel, 1060-2, life and, 1208b, necessity of, 1279b, N.T. and, 944-50, preaching and, 43a
 Documents, criticism of, 130-1, hazards of, 101, Pentateuchal, differences in, 136-7, 139-41
 Dogma, defined, 944a, Protestantism and, 47b
 Domitian, divine claims of, 1377b, 1295a, 1299a, 1339a, 1365b, 1367b
 Doom, for sin, Jeremiah on, 683-4
 Door, Christ as, 1079a
 Dor, 54a
 Dorcas, raised, 927
 Doric dialect, 881a
 Dositheus on Scripture, 946b
 Dothan, Plain of, 55b
 Douai Bible, 85a
 Doublemindedness, 1331b
 Doublets in Gospels, 869b
 Dove, symbolism of, 892b, 959a, 999b, 1068a
 Dowry, 369a
 Doxology, 1326
 Dragnet, parable of, 917b
 Dragon in Revelation, 1385b
 Drama, in Bible, 22, in Job, 484b, John's Revelation as, 1369a, Song of Songs as, 622b
 Drawers of water, 351a
 Dream, Daniel interprets, 749-52, Midianite's, 364b
 Dromedaries, 671b
 Dropsy, Jesus cures, 1047b
 Drought as punishment, 409b
 Drunkenness, folly of, 603a, 650b
 Druze Mountains, 58a
 Dry season, 624b
 Dualism, 163b, 164a, 202a, gnostic, 1350b
 Dumb, Jesus cures, 970b
 Dung gate, 471a
 Du Pin on Pentateuch, 137b
 Dust, shaking off, 971b
 Duty, man's whole, 621b
 Dysmas, crucified thief, 1057b
- ## E
- E, Pentateuchal document, 101a, 137a, 138, 139-41, 218a, 358, date, 142-3, style, 140b, theology of, 141a
 Ea, god, 120b
 Eagle, Ezekiel's allegory, 724b, symbolism of, 1382b
 Early Christian writings not in N.T., 45b; early church, educational emphasis, 46b, N.T. and, 946-8; early religion of Israel, 165-7.
 Earth, in O.T., 125a, new, 675b, repopulated, 227
 Earthquake, in Amos, 777a, in apocalyptic, 1384b, at crucifixion, 994a, in Micah, 792b, in O.T., 636b, 830b
 East, immovable, 73, Jordan, tribes on, 315a, 353, 355a
 Eastern Sea, 772a
 Ebal, Mount, 56a, 328b, 350b, 681a
 Ebed-melech, 701b
 Eber, ancestor of Hebrews, 227b
 Ecbatana, 466b
 Ecclesiastes, criticism of Ben Sirach, 98a, canon and, 96b, philosophy of, 157b, problem of, 172a
 Ecclesiasticus, apocryphal book, 196b, God in, 201a, man in, 203a, Sheol in, 212a, sin in, 203-4, value of, 170a, 171b
 Economic(s), Amos and, 775a, hardships, 472a, Jesus and, 36b, Proverbs and, 611, religion and, 328b
 Ecstasy, 150, 393a, 772b, Ezekiel's, 714a, 740a, 742b, prophecy and, 152b, 167a, 388-9, revelation and, 1367
 Eden, garden of, 221b, man expelled, 223b, sin and, 177b
 Edom (see also Edomites), destiny of, 652a, Amos' judgment, 777b, genealogy, 242, Israel's hostility, 65a, 308, 323a, 673b, 833b, 731a, 739a, 783b, Isaiah's oracle, 648a, Jeremiah's oracle, 706a, Job and, 488a, Obadiah denounces, 784-6, origin of, 231, 236a
 Edomites (see also Edom), Israel's hostility, 594b, 713a, proverbs, 156a, story of, 784b
 Education, Græco-Roman, 850a, religious, 452b, 607-8
 Eerdman's, on Pentateuch, 137b
Egeliah (= "bull calf of Yah"), 119b
 Egnatian Way, 1238a
 Egypt, archaeology and, 114a, cosmology, 122b

- Daniel on kings of, 758a, dates for O.T. study, 111, 112, exiles in, 703a, Ezekiel's oracles, 734-6, granary, 229a, 245a, Hebrews in, 61b, Isaiah's oracles, 634a, 647b, Israel and, 7a, 65b, 60-70, 109a, Jeremiah's oracles, 705a, Judah and, 424b, 650-1, literature, 120a, in Messianic age, 179b, O.T. and, 115b, Palestine, early relation with, 60
- Egyptian, coinage, 78a, Jews, temple of, 119a, psalms, 513b, slavery, 252b, versions of N.T., 865a
- Ehud, judge, 357a, 362b
- Eichhorn on Pentateuch, 136b
- Eikon, 361a
- El (see also Elohim), 259a, Elyon, 230a, Shaddai, 231b, 259a
- Elah, (1) king, 425b; (2) vale of, 56b
- Elam, Assyria and, 737a
- Elder(s) (see also Bishops), disciplining an, 1283b, in N.T., 1112b, 1125a, 1277-8, 1359, the twenty-four, 1378a
- Eleazar, 196b, Joshua and, 353b
- Election, 1340b, Amos on, 779a, Peter on, 1344b
- Elegy, in Lamentations, 709a, in O.T., 154b
- Elemental powers, Paul on, 1256-8
- Elephantine, 111b, 112a, papyri, 119a, 703b, religion at, 119b
- Elhanan, Goliath and, 392a, 410a, 444a
- Eli, his failure, 385a, his sons, 384b
- Eliakim, Isaiah and, 649a
- Elias Levita and O.T. canon, 91a, 95a
- Eliashib, Nehemiah and, 470b
- Eliezer, the name, 267b, prophet, 449b
- Elihu, speeches of, 485a, 503-5
- Elijah, 153a, Baal and, 160a, Carmel, 426, Horeb, 426b, Jesus and, 1027a, Jezebel and, 66a, John Baptist and, 891a, 973b, 1033b, life and work, 426-9, Naboth and, 428, return of, 836b, stories, 148b, strange affairs and, 131b, at transfiguration of Jesus, 1042a
- Elim, 265b
- Elimelech, 377a
- Eliphaz, 490b, first speech, Job's reply, 491-2, second speech, Job's reply, 495-6
- Elisha, 153a, life and work, 429-31, miracles of, 430-1
- Elizabeth, mother of John, 1034a
- el-Lisan* (= "the Tongue"), 57b
- Elohim (see also El), 140a, meaning, 218a, in Pentateuch, 136b, 138b, in Psalms, 509-10
- Elohish, the term, 92b
- Eltekeh, Egyptian defeat at, 68a, 435b
- Elul, month, 77b
- Elymas, sorcerer, 927, 1110a
- Emendation, conjectural, 106
- Emerald, 1377b
- Emim, 323a
- Emmaus, Jesus at, 1033a, 1058b
- Emotions of Jesus, 1003b
- Emperor worship, 11b, 852a, early Christian persecution and, 1365a, 1387a, 1390-1
- Enankalizō* (= "to take in the arms"), 984a
- Encouragement to faithfulness, 661a
- End of world, apocalyptic, 189b
- Endor, witch of, 396-7
- Endurance enjoined, 1243b, 1286b, 1323a, 1366b
- Enemies, love for, 613a, 964b
- En-gedi, 624a
- English Bible, Reformation and, 945, translations, 80-7
- En-hakkore, 370b
- Enoch, (1) apocryphal books of, 197b, 199a, 840b, 845-6, Messiah in, 210a, resurrection in, 211, Sheol in, 212a, sin, origin of, 204a; (2) the patriarch, 225b, faith of, 1320a
- Envy, folly of, 618a
- Epænetus, 1167a
- Epaphroditus, 1245b
- Ephah, (1) measure, 79b, Zechariah's vision, 823a; (2) Midianite tribe, 671b
- Ephesians, epistle, 855a, language of, 883b, message of, 942b
- Ephesus, fourth Gospel and, 857b, 1060b
- John and, 1365b, letter in Revelation, 1372, Paul at, 1121-2
- Ephod, 273b, 274a, 762b, garment, 384b, 401a, image, 365b, 385a, 386a
- Ephphatha* (= "be opened"), 882b, 1009b
- Ephraim, Isaiah's oracle of doom, 645a, jealous of Gideon, 365a, Northern Kingdom as, 763a, Samaria as, 55b, territory of, 354a
- Ephratah, 591b
- Ephron, 235a
- Epicurus, 618a
- Epileptic boy, Jesus heals, 899a, 1012a, 1042a
- Epimanes, 755a
- Episcopacy (see also Bishops, Elders), in N.T., 1360a
- Epistle of Jeremy*, 194a
- Epistles of N.T., 854b, authorship, 888b, collecting of, 858, character, 854a, origin, 18a, use by early church, 855, use to-day, 13; of Paul, survey of, 940-3, use of, 931a
- Episcopos* (see Bishops)
- Equality in the Kingdom, 985
- Erasmus, Greek N.T., 82b, 83a, 87b, 860-1
- Errors, in documents, 101b, in O.T., 101b, 102a, grammatical, in Revelation, 884b
- Esarhaddon, 111, Manasseh and, 452a
- Esau, Edomites and, 785a, Jacob and, 236, 241a, name, 236a
- Eschatology, apocalyptic and, 190, 206-13, 846b, in Daniel, 172b, in Ezekiel, 727a, in fourth Gospel, 858a, 1093a, in Isaiah, 172a, Jesus and, 1014-5, in Jude, 1361-3, N.T. and, 854a, in Psalter, 519b, 539, in Revelation, 1379, in Second Peter, 1349, in Synoptic Gospels, 991-2, in Zephaniah, 812-4
- Esdracelon, plain of, 55a, 354a
- Esdras, First Book of*, 194b
- Eshkol, grapes of, 322b
- Eshmunazar, tomb of, 778b
- Essenes, 839b, 842b, 892b, apocalyptic and, 188a, ascetics, 1162a, belief on pre-existence, 203b
- Esther, apocryphal "additions," 194b, exaltation of, 478b, Haman and, 480, patriotism, 479-80
- Eternal life, apocryphal teaching, 210-13, Jesus' teaching in fourth Gospel, 1070a, 1093a, Paul's teaching, 1220b, 1226a
- Ethical, Bible interest, 34, God's character as, 159a, Israel's early religion as, 166b, Jehovah as, 161a, idealism, 810b, preaching, 43b

- Ethics, (1) Christian, 1140a, James on, 1329b, Jesus' teaching, 909, John on, 1374, Jude on, 1361-3, Paul on, 1160-4, 1219-20, 1222, 1233-6, 1250a, 1265a, 1290, Peter on, 1342a, 1345, 1348; (2) O.T. and general, 502, apocalyptic, 198b, in Deuteronomy, 319a, in Judges, 360a, relation to idea of God, 34, religion and, 819b, 835b, theology and, 1202a, in Wisdom literature, 171-2
- Ethiopia, 783b, eunuch from, 1104, Isaiah's prophecy on, 647b
- Ethnanim (= Tishri), month, 77b
- Eucharist (see also Last Supper), in Acts, 1098a, instituted, 1017a, 1054, Paul on, 1184a, teaching in fourth Gospel, 1074
- Eunuchs, disinherited, 668b, laws on, 335b
- Euphrates-Tigris Valley, archaeology and, 114a
- Euraquilo, wind, 1131b
- Euripedes on death, 1243b
- Eusebius, Origen and, 105a
- Eutychus, Paul restores, 927, 1124a
- "Evangelist, the," in fourth Gospel, 1064
- Evangelistic preaching, 43b
- Eve, formation of, 222a, promise to, 177b
- "Everlasting Father," Isaiah's prophecy, 182a
- Evidence, laws of, 333-4
- Evil, deliverance promised, 178-81, eye, 165b, God and, 202a, overthrow of, 534, powers of, 1380b, problem in Job, 483-4, religion and, 675b, sources, 1335b, Jewish belief, 1383a, O.T. and, 205b, ultimate defeat of, 548-9
- Evil-Merodach, 111a, Jehoiachin and, 438b
- Evolution, 123a
- Ewald on Pentateuch, 136b
- Exaggeration, O.T. figures, 314b
- Excavations, O.T. and, 114-21, Palestinian, 114b
- Excommunication, church at Corinth, 1177b, Jewish, 927b
- Excuses, parable on, 987b
- Exegesis, proper, 887b
- Exile (see also Exiles), 70, 458-9, archaeology and, 118-9, an atonement, 690b, beginning of, 438b, dates of, 111a, God's will, 679a, the Law and, 143b, Messianic hope and, 185b, prophecy and, 7b, 8a, psalm of, 594, religion and, 169-73, 454, return from, 178, 463, sin and, 179b
- Exiles (see also Exile), degeneration of, 689a, Ezekiel and, 738a, Isaiah and, 654b, Jeremiah's counsel to, 696b, miseries of, 713b, returning home, 379b, 468b
- Exodus, the, 61b, 134, archaeology and, 116b, date of, 61b, 116b, 251a, Pharaoh of, 109a, significance, 178a, term, 250b
- Exorcist, Jesus and, 869a
- Experience, Bible and, 30, Christianity and, 946-8, John on Christian, 1353a, religious in Psalter, 514b
- Expiation, 396a, ignorance and, 281, in O.T., 279b, sacrifice and, 409b
- Expository preaching, 42b
- Externalities, religious, 1217a
- Extra-canonical sources, 92a
- Ezekiel, call and commission, 715b, 716b, ecstasy of, 719b, H document and, 290a, ideal community in, 742-5, Joel and, 768b, Judaism and, 457a, judgment and, 172a, the man and his book, 130b, message, 153b, 168b, Messianic prophecy, 738b, new heart, 180, symbolic actions of, 717-8
- Ezra, (1) the man: the Law and, 71a, 91b, 93a, 461a, 473, leadership of, 169a, man and work, 455, 457, nationalism of, 468-9, returns to Jerusalem, 467a, "scribeism" and, 457a, work of, 457; (2) canonical book, relation to Nehemiah and Chronicles, 96a; (3) apocryphal book, 194b, 199b

F

- Fable, 310b, Jotham's, 365b, parable and, 914b
- Faction, rebuked, 1335b
- Fair Haven, Paul at, 1131
- Faith, Abraham's, 147b, affirmed, 544b, definition and examples, 1319-21, early church and, 46b, gift of God, 1229b, Habakkuk and, 805a, Haggai and, 817b, Job's, 489a, miracles and, 925b, necessity, 907a, Paul on, 1135b, 1251b, Paul on Abraham's, 1144-6, righteousness and, 936, 1139b, salvation by, 806b, 1143-4, 1212-6, sonship and, 1215, tested, 558, in Thessalonians, 1264b, triumphant, 808b, works and, James on, 1330a, 1334
- Faithfulness, God's, 1308b, Job's, 490a, salvation and, 1319b
- Faithless, leaders, 713a, rejection of, 675b
- Fall, of Adam, 196b, of Judah, 69-70, of man, 203b, 222b
- False prophets, 150b, 151a; false teachers, dangers of, 1218b, Jude on, 1361-3, Paul on, 1277b, 1282, Peter on, 1348, signs of, 1359; false witness, 291b
- Fame, Ecclesiastes on, 615a, happiness and, 619-20
- Family life, concept in Jesus, 911a, Christian, 1260, God and, 589, Proverbs on, 605b
- Famine, in Samaria, 431a
- Fanaticism, in Esther, 478a
- Farthing, 963b, value, 79a
- Fasting, 289b, enjoined, 771-2, Ezra-Nehemiah, 474a, false and true, 670a, Jesus on, 869a, 894b, 907b, 966b, 1002b, value of, 824a
- Fat, offering of, 279b, 281a, 283b
- Fatalism, 619a
- Fate, 479b, Pharisees' belief, 1156a
- Fatherhood of God, 29b, 906-7, 983a, in Hosea, 760b, in N.T., 164b, in O.T., 766, 834b, in Psalter, 594a
- Fathers, Church, and N.T., 865b
- Fathom, length, 79b
- Fatness, as stupidity, 495b
- Faust, 614b
- Favor of God, 640b, obligations of, 1140b
- Fear, in Ecclesiastes, 618b, of God, 319b, 612b, 907a
- Feast(s) (see also Festivals), dedication, Jesus at, 1078-9, in Ezekiel's ideal temple, 744, Jewish religious, 258a, 465a, of Tabernacles celebrated, 473b, of Tabernacles, Jesus at, 1075b, of Trumpets, date, 78a
- Feeding miracles, Jesus', 869a, 923a, 1009b, 1041a
- Feet-washing, Jesus performs, 1083
- Felix, Paul and, 1128-9

- Fellowship, Christian, 938, with God, 168a,
 171a, 396a, 548b, in John's Gospel, 1352b
 Female deities, 159a
 Ferrar group of MSS., 862a
 Festal procession, 512a, 540b
 Festivals (see also Feast), of Israel, 167a, sacred, 294, 314a, 331
 Festus, Paul and, 1129b
 Fetishism, 165b, 166a
 Fidelity, 612a, Daniel's, 750-1, God's, 660b
 Fig-tree, Jesus withers, 900a, 923b, 986b,
 1047a, parable of, 1015b, 1047a
 Figs, basket of, metaphor, 694a
 Final, judgment, 207a, 1199a, reign of Christ,
 1368b
 Finality, of Christ, 1316b, of Christianity,
 1296b
 Finger, measurement, 79
 Fire, children passed through, 686a, tongues of, 447b
 Firkin, measure, 79b
 Firkowitz MSS., 102b
 Firmament in O.T., 120, 124b, 125a, 220a,
 500b
 First-born, Christ as, 1370b, dedication of,
 263b, destruction of Egyptian, 262
 First-fruits, festival, 294a, law of, 331a, ritual of, 338a
 Fish, clean and unclean, 286a, coin in mouth, 981b, gate, 471a, Jonah and great, 790b,
 net, parable of, 978a
 Flesh, meaning in Paul, 935a, 1070a, 1149a,
 1212b, 1246a, spirit and, in Paul, 1152b,
 1219b
 Flies, plague of, 260b
 Flight to Egypt, Jesus', 958a
 Flood story, 226, discrepancies, 139a, Babylonian, 120
 Folklore, in Genesis, 222a, 226b, in O.T., 368b, 733b
 Folk-songs in O.T., 155-6, 623a
 Folly, 374b, 619a, Nabal's, 395b, personified, 603-4, 607a, in Proverbs, 171b, 603-4, results, 414a, wisdom and, 615a
 Food, clean and unclean, 330a, Hebrew laws on, 749a
 Fool, rich, parable of, 1028b
 Foolishness, 490a, 1141b
 Footstool, symbol, 711a
 Foreigner, Israel and, 379, 681b, in O.T., 420b, Ruth as, 380a
 Foreordination, Jewish belief, 1111b
 Forgetfulness, man's of God, 326b, 648b
 Forgiveness, in apocalyptic, 198b, God willing,
 670-1, Jeremiah on, 682a, Jesus and, 894a, 1002a, man's of man, 909b, penitence and,
 767b, promised, 179b, 324b, reformation and,
 830
 Forgiving spirit, parable of, 982-3
 Formalism, religious, 907b, 1258, 1269a, 1289b
 Former, days, lauded, 619b, prophets, 93b,
 357a
Formgeschichte, 870a, 871a
 Forsaken, of God, 525b, Jesus on cross, 1020
 Fortitude, plea for, 1338a
 Foundation, Christ the, 1175b, rock or sand, 968-9
 Foundling, Ezekiel's allegory, 723
 Fountain, of cleansing, 830a, gate, 471a
 Four-document hypothesis of Gospels, 872b
 Fourth Ezra (see also Ezra (3), Second Esdras), 211b, 840b, 844b, 845-6, 847a
 Fourth Gospel, authorship, 1065-6, composition of, 1062-5, duration of Jesus' ministry, 875a, historicity, 1060-2, Jesus in, 893a, language, 843a, miracles, 922a, 926b, origin and purpose, 857-8, problem of, 888a, religious significance, 1066, 1092-3, synoptics and, 1060, teachings, 1093, textual problems,
 857b
 Foxes, in O.T., 624b, Samson, 370b
 Frankincense, 280a, 685a
 Free-will, election and, 1245b, Paul on, 1156a, 1226, predestination and, 1252b, sin and,
 1332a
 Freedom, in Christ, 1077b, Christian, 1208b,
 1218, in religion, 908b
 Friends, Job's three, 483-5, 490b, Society of,
 use of Bible, 946a
 Friendship, broken, 543-4, Paul and Philemon, 1292-4, Paul and Timothy, 1285, Proverbs on, 612b
 Frogs, plague of, 260b
 Fruit, good and evil, 975b, of Palestine, 59b
 Fulfillment, prophecy in Jesus, 185-6
 Fullness, of Christ, 1233b, of Godhead, 1254b
 Furlong, length, 79b
 Furnace, Daniel in, 751a, Ezekiel's oracle,
 728b
 Furniture, tabernacle, 272
 Fürst on prophetic canon, 95a
 Future, apocalyptic and, 190b, Israel's glorious,
 659-90, prophecy and, 152a, 190b; future life, 414b, apocalyptic and, 190a, 210-13, in Daniel, 748a, in Job, 174a, in O.T., 173b, in Psalter, 173b

G

- Gaal, 366a
Gabbatha, 1089a
 Gabriel, 748a, 756a, Daniel and, 755b, function of, 205a, Mary and, 891b, in Revelation,
 1383b
 Gad, Moses' blessing, 344a, territory of, 315
 Gadarenes, 1006b
 Gaius, 1171b, 1360b
 Galatia, evangelized, 877b, Paul in, 1121b
 Galatians, epistle, Christianity in, 1208, location of churches, 1207-8, teaching of, 940
 Galileans, origin of, 118a
 Galilee, apocalyptic and, 188b, Jesus' ministry in, 893, 1070-5, Judæa contrasted with, 12a, or Naphthali, 54b, people and customs, 842b
 Gall, 711b
 Gallio, Paul and, 1120b, pro-consul, 876b
 Gallows, Haman on, 481b
 Gamaliel (1), advice on apostles, 1102a; (2)
 Rabbân, son of foregoing, deposed, 98a
 Garments of priests, 273b, 284a
 Gate(s), of death, 519b, of Jerusalem, names of, 471a, place of judgment, 502a, 780b, symbol of power, 506b
 Gaza, 361a, Samson and gates of, 370b
 Gebalites, 417b
 Gedaliah, governs Judah, 70a, 438b, Jeremiah
 and, 702

- Gehazi, avarice of, 430b
 Gehenna (=Hinnom), 211a, 212, 292a, 686a, 1012b
 Genealogy, Babylonian, 120b, in Chronicles, 441-2, Hebrew, 120b, Jesus', 956-7, weakness of, 457a
 Generosity, 611b, Paul enjoins, 1202b, reward of, 620b Genesis, 134, Babylon and, 127a, chronology of, 126a, cosmogony of, 126-8, differentia of, 147a, divisions of, 217b, early stories, 167b, Hebrew origins and, 60-1, interpretation of, 219a, Jubilees and, 193b, origins and, 219-25, religious value, 144, science and, 122-8
 Geneva Bible, 84b
 Gennesaret, Sea of, 980a
 Gentiles, Christ's salvation for, 1299-1300, Christianity and, 934a, destruction threatened, 773, early church and, 1106-7, 1113a, evangelization of, 877b, Jews, relations with, 790, Law and, 1140b, Messiah and, 660a, millenium and, 208a, 208b, Paul and, 939b, 1158b
Genuflectentes (=knee-benders), 47a
 Geography, Israel influenced by, 5a, 6b, of N.T., 11b, 12a, Palestinian, 53-8
 Geology, Palestinian, 53
 Ger (=stranger), 293b
 Gerasene demoniac, Jesus cures, 1006, 1040b
 Gerizim, Mount, 112a, 328b, Samaritan temple at, 440b
 Gershon, 254a
 Geshem, Nehemiah and, 461b, 470b
 Gethsemane, Jesus in, 901b, 1017-8, 1031b, 1055b, 1087b
 Gezer, 421a, captured, 63, excavations at, 114b, pillars at, 119b
 Giants, origin of, 205b, 225b
 Gibbon on fall of Rome, 1393a
 Gibeah, 388a, outrage at, 358a, 374-5
 Gibeon, Solomon at, 446a
 Gibeonites, avenged on Saul, 409b, Joshua tricked by, 350b, Joshua rescues, 351
 Gideon, 357b, sacrifice, 131b, story of, 363-5
 Gift(s), salvation a, 666-7, varieties of, Paul on, 926b, 1187
 Gilead, described, 58a, Israel and, 367, Jacob's covenant at, 240a
 Gilgal, 329a, 348, 354a, 475b, 780a, sanctuary at, 765b
 Girdle, Jeremiah's figure of, 689a
 Gleaning, 291b, 337a, 377-8
 Glory of God, 201b, 204b, 272a, 276b, 277b, 285a, 447b, 529b, 770a, 817a, 1333b, 1397a, Ezekiel's vision of, 716a, meanings of, 1143a
 Gnat and camel, 990b
Gnosis in Paul, 941a
 Gnosticism, characteristics, 1350-1, at Colossæ, 1250, John on, 1359b, in Philippians, 1239b
 God, anger of, 711a, apprehended by men, 29a, arbitrary, 617b, attributes, 160-4, Christian idea, 1000a, confessed universally, 658a, constancy of, 665b, Creator, 160b, 219-23, dependable, 657a, in desert religion, 76b, in Deuteronomy, 219b, developing idea, 133, 175b, early ideas, 166, ethical, 34, 161a, evil and, 202a, 484, 504a, in Ezekiel, 714b, faithful, 1308-9, Fatherhood, 29b, fidelity, 660a, final reign of, 830-1, greatness, 505, Greek and Jewish ideas contrasted, 851-2, helper of man, 504a, history and, 158b, 171a, 382b, holiness, 161a, idea grows, 6, 8a, incomprehensible, 493a, inescapable, 595, integrity, 339, intertestamental conception, 200-2, in Isaiah, 168a, 639b, 654-8, Jesus' idea, 906-8, in Job, 490b, 492, 493a, 494b, 505-7, justice, 161a, 188b, 492, 494a, 503b, Kingdom and, 911b, knowledge of, 201b, love, 6b, majesty, 669b, messenger of, 364a, names for, 1034a, nature and, 158b, 165a, 523b, in O.T., 9a, 158-64, 383b, 386b, 440b, 414b, omnipresence, 160b, oneness, 326a, personal, 158, plan of, 190a, power, 160, 493, 494a, priestly conception, 454a, primitive idea, 311a, prophetic conception, 454a, 776b, in Proverbs, 605a, 612a, providence, 504b, in Psalter, 170b, 514a, purpose of, 160b, recompense by, 504a, revealed in Christ, 29a, 1350a, righteousness, 814, sacrificial, 1387a, self-manifestation of, 268, self-revelation in a Son, 1300, spirituality, 160b, suffering, 202a, 766a, true view of, 29a, uniqueness, 324b, unity, 160a, unjust, 483b, wickedness and, 500a, wisdom of, 201b, 493b, 501, in wisdom literature, 454a
 Godliness, 1289a, mystery of, 1281b, rewards of, 1284b
 Goël, kinsman-avenger, 337b, 378a, 496a, 497b
 Gog, 683a, Ezekiel's oracles on, 741, and Magog in Revelation, 1395b
 Goim, 230a
 Golden, age, apocalyptic and, 189b, Israel's, 814b; rule, 968a, in Matthew, 870a, in Proverbs, 611b
 Goliath, David and, 392a, Elhanan and, 410a, 444a, value of story, 148b
 Gomer, infidelity of, 761b
 Gomorrah destroyed, 233a
 Good, conflict with evil, origin of, 1386b, man and suffering, 486b, name, 619a, news of Gospel, 910b, 933a, tidings in Isaiah, 672a, will, 909b
 Goodness, attainment of, 611b, God's, 534, profitable, 504b, in Proverbs, 612a, significance, 968b, tested by evil, 483b
 Goshen, Hebrews and, 61b
 Gospel, form and substance, 889b, Gospels and, 856a, Jesus' relation to, 37-8, meaning, 856a, 998b, Mosaic Law and, 933b, mystery, 1173b, in O.T., 667a, 767b, originality of, 887a, Paul on, 1138a, perversion of, 1209a
 Gospels, biographies, 18a, dissimilarities in, 869-70, MSS. and, 871a, origin of, 856, 867-73, problem of synoptic, 888a, similarities in, 868b, study of, 12, supplement each other, 956
 Gourd, Jonah's, 788a
 Grace, gifts of, 1213a, God's, 327b, 1290b, Law and, 326b, in O.T., 175a, parables of, 918a, Paul on God's, 941b, 1145a, 1226b, 1229a
 Graded Bible lessons, 49-50
 Græco-Roman world, strength and weakness, 847, 850a, 852a
 Graf-Wellhausen theory of Pentateuch, 137

Grains of Palestine, 59b
 Grapes, Eshkol, 322b, sour, 690b
 Gratitude in Jonah, 788a
 Grätz on O.T. canon, 97b
 Graven image, 291b, Micah's, 372b
 Great, Bible (Cranmer's), 84b, synagogue, 91a
 Grecians, meaning, 773b
 Greece, Israel and, 148a, O.T. and, 460a
 Greed denounced, 642a, 791a, 807a
 Greek, Bible (see Septuagint), Catholic church, doctrine of, 946b, church fathers, 865b, coinage, 78a, culture, 849b, religion, 122b, thought and O.T., 164; Greek language, in N.T., 23b, 859b, 880-4, Jews and, 842-3, in Palestine, 928b, value of studying, 884b
 Greeks, in Habbakuk, 804, Hebrews and, 324a, Jesus and, 1082b, Jews and, 10b
 Green on Pentateuch, 137b
 Gregory, Caspar René, 861a
 Grenfell and Hunt, 864a
 Grief, 468b, David's for Absalom, 407b
 Griesbach and Greek N.T., 861a
 Grinding at mill, 658b
 Ground cursed, 223b
 Guardian angels, 205a, 757b
 Guilds, prophetic, 429b, 430a
 Guilelessness, 1341b
 Guilt, bearing, 306a, offering, regulations, 282, in O.T., 174b, universal, 1142b

H

H, symbol of O.T. document, 289b
 Habakkuk, Daniel and, 194b, his message, 153a
Habiru (=Hebrews, Bedouin), 52b, 109a
 Hadad, opposes Solomon, 422a, -rimmon, 830a
 Hadassah, 478b
 Hades (see also Sheol), 173a, 490b, Jesus in (?), 1342b, in Revelation, 1396a
 Hævernack on Pentateuch, 137b
 Hagar, story of, 230b
Haggadah, 456b, 842b
 Haggai, message of, 153b, Messiah in, 184a, 185b, postexilic life and, 169a, Temple, 460a, 466b, Zechariah and, 819a
Hagiographa (see also "Writings"), 91a
 Hail, plague of, 261a
 Hair, sacred, 300b, Samson's, 371a
Halakhah, 456b, 842b
 Hallel psalms, 580-4, hallelujah, 509b
 Ham, 227a
 Haman, Esther and, 479, Jews and, 477-82
 Hamath, location, 304a, 781a
 Hammiphkad, gate of, 471a
 Hammurabi, 108b, 116a, 121a, 145b, 169b, 229b
 Hamutal, 726a
 Hanamel, Jeremiah and, 698b
 Hananel, tower of, 471a
 Hanani, seer, 449a, Nehemiah and, 470a
 Hananiah, Egyptian Jews and, 119a, fate of, 691a, Jeremiah and, 696a
 Handbreadth, measurement, 79
 Handwashing, ritualistic, 842a, symbolical, 993b, 1089a
 Hannah, Samuel and, 384, song, 384
 Hannibal, Romans and, 698b
 Happiness, quest for, 617-20
 Haran, Terah and, 61a

Harbonah, 481b
 Hardening of heart, 323a, 1234a
 Harklean Syriac N.T., 865a
 Harlot, Rome as, 1391b, Nineveh as, 802-3
Har-Magedon (see also Armageddon), 1391a
 Harnack, on early Christian theology, 947b, 948b, on Paul's dates, 878, on Q, 869b
 Harvest, festival, 331b, of judgment, 1390a, thanksgiving, 550
 Hasidæans, 446a
 Hasidim, 600b
 Hatch on Græco-Roman world, 850
 Hate, God's for Esau, 1156a, Jesus on, 972b, 1048a, in N.T., 1336a, 1085b, in Obadiah, 785a, in Psalter, 596
 Hathach, 480a
 Hatshepsut, Moses and, 251a
 Hauran, the, 58a, 488b
 Havvoth, 323b
 Hazael, 110b, 777b, oppresses Israel, 66b
 Hazeroth, 303a
 Headlam on dates of Jesus, 874
 Healing ministry, Jesus', 893b
 Heart, O.T. meaning, 352b, 500b, 625b, 673b, 683b, 962a, renewal of, 180
 Heathen worship acceptable, 832b, 834a
 Heave-offering, 283b, 329b
 Heaven, apocalyptic idea, 199a, Jehovah and, 160b, meaning, 966a, new, 190a, 675b, in Revelation, 1377-9
 Heavy-laden, Jesus invites, 974-5
 Hebrew, Bible, printed, 103a, conception of world, 123b, language, 85a, 87, 99-100, 154-6, law and Babylonian, 145-6, meaning in N.T., 1298b, origins, 60-1, 116b, poetry, 23, 155a, 154-7, 602, prophecy, 167-9, psychology, 165a, religion, 115a, 145b, writing, 99-100
 Hebrews (= Aperu?), 117a, art and, 119b, covenant people, 178a, in Egypt, 61, history, 60-73, Khabiru?, 116b, 117a, origin, 108b, other nations and, 121a, Philistines and, 147b, polytheists, 159b, religion of, 62a, 144b, religious instruction of, 45, science and, 124a, tradition, 147a; Hebrews, epistle to, 854b, language of, 883b, O.T. and, 132b
 Hebron, 141b, Caleb and, 353b, fertility, 304a, location, 56b
 Hegai, Esther and, 478b
 Heidigger on Pentateuch, 137b
 Heifer, red, ritual of, 307a
 Heirodulia, 336a
 Helena, queen, of Adiabene, 877b
 Hell, 963, 1012b
 Hellenism, 197b, 202b, Christianity and, 852, in fourth Gospel, 857b, in Hebrews, 1296, 1298a, Jews and, 847b, 849-50, Judaism and, 10b, 71a, 95a, 187b, 190b, 212b, 445b
 Hellenists in N.T., 939a, 1102b
 Hellenistic Greek, 880-1
 Helvetic Confession, 945a
 Henna-flowers, 624a
 Henotheism, Hebrew, 430
Hephzibah (=delight), 672b
 Herding in Palestine, 59b
Herem (=ban), 361a
 Heresy and creed, 947a
Hermas, Shepherd of, parables in, 916a

- Hermes, Paul taken for, 1112a
 Herod, (1) the Great, 71b, Caesarea built by, 54a, massacres innocents, 958b, last illness, 58b; (2) Antipas, tetrarch, Jesus and; 869a, 899a, 902a, 978b, 1029a, 1040b, 1047b, 1056, John Baptist and, 897a, 978b; (3) Agrippa I., in Acts, 877b, James killed by, 1108a, painful death, 1109a
 Herodians, 895a, 1004a
 Herodias, 897a, John Baptist and, 978b
 Herodotus, on coinage, 78a, on Sennacherib's army, 118b, 635b
 Heshbon, 309b, 323a
 Hesychius, Origen and, 105a
 Hexapla, Origen's, 104-5
 Hexastich, poetic, 155a
 Hexateuch, 345a, meaning, 134b, origin, 92b
 Hezekiah, Isaiah and, 638b, 652b, life extended, 652b, reform of, 169a, reign of, 68, 435-6, 451b, Sennacherib and, 118, 633-6
 Hierarchy, angelic, 204b
 High places, 166a, 775; high-priest, consecration, 132a, regulations, 293a
 Higher criticism, 130-1, 887a
 Hilkiah, 320b, finds Lawbook, 437a
 Hillel, Rabbi, 964a, golden rule and, 968a, school of, 841b
 Hin, measure, 79b
 Hinnom (see also Gehenna), 211a, 686a, location, 56a, 212a, purification promised, 698a
 Hippopotamus, 507a
 Hiram of Tyre, 417b, 418b, Solomon and, 446a, 448a
 Historical, criticism, 131-2, literature, 17b, 145-9, method with Paul, 931b, narratives of O.T., 147, preaching, 43a
 History, apocalyptic and, 191b, 844, apocrypha and, 192-3, Bible a record of, 853, characteristics of Bible, 21b, compilation of O.T., 412-3, 439, Exodus and, 250b, in fourth Gospel, 1060-2, in Genesis, 218b, God and, 158b, 171a, 382b, 514b, 538a, 550, 576, 1378b, Jesus and, 957a, Jewish method of writing, 143a, N.T. and, 886a, in O.T., 5, 132, in Pentateuch, 134, prophecy and, 1381b, providence and, 416b, religion and, 71-2, 362a, 372a, 379-80, 413b, 439-40, 648b, 1398, significance of, 123b
 Hittites, 255b, 304b, in Judaea, 60a, language, 114b, origin, 108b
 Hivites, 255b, 350b, 362a
Hokhma (= wisdom), 616b
 Holiness, Christian, 1226b, 1256a, code, 146b, contagious, 283a, 285b, 744a, Ezekiel on God's, 714b, God's, 161a, 162b, 201a, 572a, 643a, Isaiah on God's, 168a, Jesus' view of, 894a, Law of, 289-96, offering, 170a, primitive idea, 306a, ritual of, 818a, taboo and, 74b
 Holofernes, 195b
 Holy, city, a, 824b, of Holies, 289a, 446b, 1314b, moral term, 780a, One of Israel, 640b, profaning the, 967b, ritual sense, 773b, water, 300a
 Holy Land, the (see also Canaan, Palestine), 52-59
 Holy Spirit (see also Spirit), empowerment by, 1357, in fourth Gospel, 1085a, Jesus gives, 1033a, in Luke, 1034a, in O.T. and N.T., 176a, Paul's conception, 1153b, Pentecost and, 1097, sin against, 1005a
 Home, Christian, 1260, ethics of, 1235-6, God and, 589, Proverbs on, 610b
 Homer, measure, 79b
 Homilies, apocrypha and, 192a, 195-6
 Honesty, 337b
 Hope, 620a, anchor, 1309a, Christian, Paul on, 1154, in God, 712a, persistence of, 587, power of, 906a
 Hophni, 385a
 Hophra Pharaoh, deposed, 704b, Ezekiel's oracles against, 734-6
 Hor, Mount, 308b, 316b
 Horeb (or Sinai), 62a, 139b, 140a, 324a, covenant at, 325, Elijah at, 426b, location, 254a, Moses at, 254b
 Hormah, 361a
 Horn(s), of altar, 779b, little, in Daniel, 755a, smiths and, Zechariah's vision, 821a, symbol of power, 711a
 Hornet, 355b
 Horse(s), 332, 506b, 767b, gate, 471a, men, demonic, in Revelation, 1382-3, in O.T., 620a, 623b, 831b, Solomon's, 421b, visions of in Revelation, 1379-80, Zechariah's vision, 820b
 Hosanna, meaning, 986a
 Hosea, Amos and, 759, burial place, 58a, children of, 761b, fall of Israel and, 434a, Israel and, 679b, on Jehu's revolution, 117b, message of, 153a, 168a, times of, 67a, work of, 631a
 Hoshea, Egypt and, 633b, his reign, 67b, 434b, Tiglath-pileser on, 118a
 Hospitality, in Bible lands, 75b, enjoined, 1324b, Hebrew, 233a, Jesus on, 972b
 Host(s), God of, 779b, Lord of, 385b, of heaven, 324b, 332a
 House of God, 669a, 817a, love for, 528b, 537-8
Hozeh (= gazer), 150a
 Huet on Pentateuch, 137b
 Huleh, Lake, 56b
 Humaneness, religion and, 320
 Humanity, Christ's, 1302b, reverence for, 909b
 Humiliation of Christ, 1302
 Humility, 611b, meaning, 908b, religion and, 224a
 Humor in parables, 919b
 Hupfeld on Pentateuch, 136b
 Hur, 267a
 Hiram-abi (see Hiram)
 Husbandmen, parable of wicked, 987, 1053a
 Hushai, Ahitophel and, 407a, David and, 406a
 Husks, 286b
 Huxley, on creation of Eve, 126b, on prophets, 122a
 Hybrids, forbidden, 291b, laws on, 334
 Hygiene, laws on, 335b, religion and, 288b
 Hyksos, kings, 61b, 243a, 252a, origin, 108b
 Hymnology, early church, 858b
 Hypocrisy, example of, 1100-1, Jesus on, 965a, meaning, 1057b
 Hyssop, 288a, 1089b, purifying, 542b

I

- Ibn Ezra and Pentateuch, 136a
 Iconium, Paul at, 1112a
 Idealism, Jesus', 35
 Idolatry, 5b, 8a, 291b, denounced, 669a, folly of, 657a, 687b, 807b, forbidden, 324, God, worship of, contrasted, 658a, not post-exilic, 130b, to pass away, 179a
 Idumeans, 71b, 785a
 Ignatius on "bishop," 135a
 Ignorance, sins of, 305a
 Ikhnaton (see also Amenhotep IV), faith of, 595b, hymn of, 575a
 Ilgen on Pentateuch, 136b
 Image, apocalyptic and, 189b, Daniel refuses worship, 750a, of God, meaning, 221a, molten and graven, 767a, Moses and, 161a, worship, 268b
 Imitation of Christ, 1353b
 Immaculate conception, 892a
 Immanuel, 183a, sign, 643b
 Immorality, effects, 1140a
 Immortality, 179b, 203a, 320b, apocalyptic and, 190a, 210-13, in Ecclesiastes, 615b, 621a, in Ecclesiasticus, 197a, false religion and, 763, Hebrew belief, 403b, in Job, 495a, 497b, in Judaism, 164a, in O.T., 173-4, 649b, present evil and, 489b, in Proverbs, 612a, in Psalter, 540b, 555b, Paul on, 1190-3
 Impiety, Belshazzar's, 752a
 Importance in prayer, 968a, parable of, 1028a, 1044a
 Imprecatory psalms, 6b, 171a, 579
 Incarnation, 886b, 1233a, 1302b, in Colossians, 1253-6, in fourth Gospel, 1062b, 1066-7, John on, 1351, Messiah and, 182, Paul on, 1244-5, significance of, 176b, virgin birth and, 892a
 Incense, altar of, 275a, burning, 681a
 Inconsistencies in Bible, 464
 Individual, church and, 1318b, in Proverbs, 606a, responsibility of, 737b
 Individualism, Ezekiel's, 714b, 725, Jeremiah's, 168a, 679b, Jonah's, 789a, of Psalter, 171a
 Inequalities of life, 619b
 Inerrancy, Bible, 26-7, 101-2, of O.T., 105b, 106a, of Pentateuch, 138-41
 Infallibility of Scripture, 130a
 Infant, Jesus, 891a, sacrifice, 119b
 Infidelity, religious, 811b
 Ingathering (see also Feast, Tabernacles), 294b
 Ingratitude, denounced, 723b, Israel's, 577, 681a, man's, 341b, man's to God, 796b, punishment of, 767
 Inheritance, laws of, 313
 Iniquity in O.T., 174b
 Injustice, 545b, Amos denounces, 776a, in courts, 617b, Micah denounces, 794a, God's, 493a, social, 641b
 Innocence, Job asserts, 499b, 500
 Inscriptions, 114b, N.T. Greek and, 881a, Sennacherib's, 634b
 Insects, clean and unclean, 286b
 Inspiration, 428b, apocalyptic and, 172b, Bible, 132b, divine, 389a, epistles and, 855b, evidence of, 28a, extra-biblical, 46a, N.T. and, 889, prophetic, 150, 167b, science and, 128b, Scripture and, 129a, verbal, 27b, 41a
 Installation offering, 284
 Institutions, religious, 34, 679b, 907b, Judaistic, 193b
 Intercession, Jeremiah's, 689b, man's with God, 572a, Moses', 276, 304b, 328a, place of, 1280, of saints, 192b, Solomon's, 420
 Interest, laws on, 336a
 Inter-marriage, Ezra's ban on, 468-9
 Intermediate state, 203a, 209a, 211b, 212a
 Internationalism, Christianity and, 1106b
 Interpretation, Bible, 6b, 26, 28b, 29a, 40a, 41b, 349, 788, of Christ in N.T., 46a, of O.T., 378b, literary form and, 19, of Revelation of John, 1364b
 Interpreters, prophetic, 151-2
 Intertestamental, literature, 187-99, religion, 200-13
 Intolerance, Ezra's, 469
 Ionic dialect, 881a
 Ira, 408b
 Irenaeus and creed, 948a
 Irrigation, 328b
 Isaac, Abraham and, 139a, birth of, 233b, blessing, 155b, death, 242a, marriage, 235, name, meaning, 233b, promised, 231, 232a, sacrifice by Abraham, 234, 1320b
 Isaac ben Jasos on Pentateuch, 136a
 Isaiah, Ahaz and, 434, 643b, Assyria and, 638-9, authors of book, 94a, 131a, background, 631-6, call of, 643a, character and work, 636-9, conception of God, 161-3, 168a, Cyrus and, 7b, disciples of, 168b, eschatology, 172a, 173b, Hezekiah and, 435a, 652b, Jeremiah and, 628a, martyrdom of, 196b, 436b, message, 153a, Messiah in, 182-3, 639, Micah and, 792a, Second, 7b, study of, value, 8b, times of, 67a, virgin birth in, 891b
 Iscariot, 1004, meaning, 1037b
 Ish-baal, -bosheth, Gilead and, 399a, assassination of, 400a
 Ishmael, (1) Abraham's son, birth of, 230b, expelled, 233b, genealogy of, 235b; (2) assassin of Gedaliah, 70a, 702b
 Ishtar (see also Astarte), 166b, 366b, 421b
 Isis-Serapis worship, 851a
 Israel (see also Northern Kingdom), 139a, Assyria and, 64-9, 631-6, Babylon and, 69, demands a king, 387-8, destiny of, 652a, divided, 65, Edom and, 308, Egypt and, 60-69, 109a, faithless bride, 761-4, foreigner and, 379, ideal, 656b, 659b, Jacob's new name, 139b, 140a, 240b, Judah and, 65, judges over, 361-72, kings of, 412, luxury in, 66-7, name on inscriptions, 116a, Moab and, 118a, neighboring peoples, 60-72, 187a, other nations, 148a, 167b, origins, 108, Persia and, 71, Philistines and, 385-6, priestly conception of history, 454-5, religion of, 8a, 71-2, 165-76, 217a, re-union of, 682b, salvation and, 178a, unity of, 159a
 Israelites, Hebrews distinct from, 117a, number of, 299
 Issachar, Moses' blessing, 344a
 Ithobaal II, of Tyre, 733a
 Ittai, 406a
 Iyyar (=Ziv), month, 77b

J

- J document, 101a, 137a, 138, 139-41, 218a, 358, archaeology and, 115a, creation in, 221-2, date, 142-3, style, 140b, theology, 140-1
- Jabbok, 309a, location, 58a
- Jabesh-Gilead, 374a, destroyed, 375b, Saul and, 148a
- Jacob, 139b, 140a, Bethel, 237b, blesses sons, 246-7, blessing of, 155b, death and burial, 247b, deception, 132b, in Egypt, 246, Esau and, 236, for Israel, 781b, Laban and, 237-40, marriages of, 238, name, 236a, name on inscriptions, 116a, Penuel, 240b; restitution, 147b, returns to Canaan, 240, returns to Bethel, 241b, sin, 219a, sons of, 238b, story of, 235-42, striving of, 766b
- Jacob ben Chayyim's Bible, 103a
- Jael, Sisera and, 76a, 362b
- Jaffa gate, 471a
- Jah (= Jehovah), 265a, 372b
- Jahaziel predicts victory, 450a
- Jair, judge, 366b
- Jairus, daughter restored, 896b, 924a, 1006-7, 1040b
- James, (1) the Lord's brother, 1327-8, advises Paul to pay vows, 1126, at Jerusalem conference, 1113-4, head of Jerusalem church, 1109a; (2) son of Zebedee, 1327b, killed by Herod, 877b, 1108b; (3) father of Judas, not Iscariot, 1327b; (4) son of Alphæus, 1327b; (5) epistle of, 855a, author, identity of, 1327-8
- Jamnia, council of, 41b, 98
- Japheth, 227a
- Jashar*, Book of, 91b, 100b, 157a, 351b, 398a
- Jason, (1) of Cyrene, 192b; (2) Paul's host, 1118b
- Jasper, 1377b
- Jaulan, the, described, 58a
- Javan, 732b
- Jealousy, God's, 356a, Jehovah's, 772a, Saul's, 392b
- Jebel Asha, 58a
- Jebel Musa, 62a, 254b
- Jebus (= Jerusalem), 374b, Jebusite, 255b, 304b
- Jechoniah (see Jehoiachin), 478b
- Jehoahaz, 69a, reign of, 432b, 437b, 452b
- Jehoash (not Joash), reign of, 433a
- Jehoiakim, burns Jeremiah's roll, 700b, Jeremiah on, 693a, reign of, 69a, 437b, 452b, for Zedekiah, 102a
- Jehoiachin (see Jeconiah), reign of, 438a, 452b, surrender of, 69b
- Jehoida saves Joash, 66b
- Jehoram, (1) king of Israel, Moab and, 66a, reign of, 429b; (2) king of Judah, reign of, 431b
- Jehoshaphat, Ahab and, 66b, reign of, 428b, 449b; Valley of, 56b, 769a, 773a
- Jehovah, 139b, 140a, Baal and, 159b, 161, conception in O.T., 158-64, Day of, Jesus on, 911a, differing ideas of, 426, early limitations, 160, ethical, 161a, "I Am," 256, Israel adopted by, 62, king, 181b, limitations of, 161a, 430b, meaning, 166a, as One, 146a, 159a, in Pentateuch, 136b, 138, primitive ideas, 166, prophets and, 159b, significance of name, 158b, vengeance of, 673, war-god, 363a, "word" of, 532a, worship, where rendered, 139a
- Jehovist, 92b
- Jehu, (1) king, Assyria and, 632a, Shalmaneser and, 117b, reign of, 432, slaughters of, 66a; (2) seer, 449b
- Jephthah, 357b, daughter of, 368a, story of, 367-8
- Jeremiah, biography of, 695-708, buys field, 698, call of, 680b, Consolation, Book of, 697-8, in Egypt, 703-4, false prophets and, 151a, hostility to, 688b, imprisoned and released, 701, judgment and, 172a, message, 153a, 168a, Messiah and, 183a, Nahum and, 802b, new covenant, 175b, 179a, 180b, 1313b, plot against, 691b, 695a, predicts captivity, 694b, religious critic, 678-9, roll burned, 700, significance of, 679b, Temple address, 685, on Temple, 685; Book of Jeremiah, 680a, compilation of, 94, corrupt text, 94b, LXX translation of, 104a
- Jeremias on Pentateuch, 137b
- Jeremiel, function of, 205a
- Jeremy*, Epistle of, 194a
- Jericho, capture of, 349, excavations, 114b, fall of, 63a, Jesus at, 899b, location, 347a, refounded, 426a
- Jeroboam, (1) I, in Egypt, 64b, northern revolt under, 65a, 433-4, Solomon opposed by, 422a, punishment and death, 424b; (2) II, achievements of, 631, prosperity under, 776a, reign of, 66-7, 433b
- Jerome, on Symmachus, 104b, Vulgate and, 105a, 865b
- Jerusalem, David captures, 64a, 442b, David's capital, 400, council on circumcision, 878b, 1113b, 1328a, destruction of, 111a, 169a, 840a, early church in, 1096-1103, first deportation, 438a, future glory, 671a, Gospel-source for Matthew, 955, Jesus' lament over, 869b, 991a, in Messianic age, 179b, Micah on doom of, 794, moral failure of, 813-4, names of, 374b, Nebuchadrezzar captures, 70a, 438, 701-2, Nehemiah rebuilds, 461b, 470-5, Paul and church at, 939b, 941b, religious capital of world, 795b, restoration predicted, 666a, 699a, Sennacherib besieges, 634-5, siege of, poems on, 709b
- Jeshua, 464
- Jeshurun, 657a
- Jesus (see also Christ), Adam and, 176a, anointing of, 1026b, apocalyptic and, 846b, 888b, 1014-5, appoints the Twelve, 970-3, arrested, 1018, authority of, 936a, 974-5, baptism of, 959, 999, 1035b, 1068a, biblical ideals and, 35-6, birth of, 1025-6, 1034b, boyhood, 1035a, on Bread of life, 1074, brothers of, 1096b, calls first disciples, 1068b, at Cana wedding, 1068, at Capernaum, 960a, on ceremonialism, 897, charged with blasphemy, 1004-5, childhood, 958b, chooses the Twelve, 895b, 1037, cleanses Temple, 986a, 1069a, common people and, 916b, 975, compassion of, 979b, controversies, 1072-82, criterion of biblical revelation,

36-7, crucifixion, 1056-8, dates in his life, 874-9, David's son, 989a, differing representations, 957b, discourse at Nazareth, 1025a, 1026a, divine sonship of, 980b, early years, 12b, economic questions and, 36b, emotions of, 953b, example in suffering, 1341a, on fall of Jerusalem, 1051a, fasting, his view of, 894b, the Father and, 905a, at Feast of Dedication, 1078-9, feeds five thousand, 1073, flight to Egypt, 958a, foretells sufferings, 980-1, forgives sin, 894a, forgiveness taught, 1002a, in fourth Gospel, 1060, friend of sinners, 918a, genealogy, 956-7, in Gethsemane, 1017-8, 1055b, God, his idea of, 164b, 175b, 906-7, "good," Master, 984a, Good Shepherd, 1079, the Greeks and, 1082b, healing miracles, 1006-7, heals blind, 1010b, 1014a, 1078b, heals centurion's son, 1072a, heals epileptic boy, 1012a, heals paralytic, 1002a, highpriestly prayer, 1086-7, holiness, view of, 894a, idealist, 35, invitation to heavy-laden, 974-5, Isaiah and, 640a, Jeremiah and, 679b, Jerusalem ministry, 1061, John Baptist and, 892, 958-9, 973, journey to Jerusalem, 899, 1042b, Judaism and, 187b, as king, 181b, on Kingdom of God, 911-13, his knowledge, 129, languages of, Aramaic and Greek, 843a, 880a, last days on earth, 1096, at Last Supper, 1017, 1031, and Law, 840a, 933b, 962-3, 969b, life of, 12, 891-903, on life from God, 910, on life with God, 908, on life with men, 909, Light of the world, 1077a, lowliness of, 974-5, Magi and, 958a, messages of, 13b, Messianic claims, 973, 987a, Messianic prophecy and, 185-6, mighty works of, 896, 969, ministry, length of, 875, ministry, pre-Gospel, 867a, miracles of, 921-30, Nazareth and, 1005, 1007b, his "new family," 1027a, N.T. and, 46, O.T. and, 129, 186, 217a, 905a, in O.T., 853b, his references to O.T., 97a, 133a, opposition to, 894, 1002-5, Palestine, beyond borders of, 897b, parables of, 914-20, 977a, 1005-6, Paul and, 931-2, Paul and, their teachings, 1160b, 1164, Pharisees and, 934b, 989-91, plot to kill, 1016a, portrait in Mark, 997-8, the preacher, 1000a, predicts his sufferings, 897-8, 1010-3, prophets and, 176a, public ministry, 893, raises Lazarus, 1080-1, as realist, 35, relation to God, 898a, relation to Gospel, 37-8, religion, his idea of, 907-10, resurrection of, 902-3, 1020-1, 1033a, 1058-9, 1090-2, Sabbath and, 895a, 1003a, Satan and, 7a, as Saviour, 1280a, his self-consciousness, 905-6, Sermon on Mount in Luke, 1037-8, sinlessness of, 1077b, his spirit, 36b, the Suffering Servant, 183b, table-talk of, 1047b, as teacher, 36, as teacher and healer, 1000-1, teaching of, 904-13, and Temple, 36a, 446, temptation of, 892-3, 959-60, 999b, 1036a, transfiguration, 898b, 981a, 1027b, 1041b, trial of, 11b, 1056, trial and crucifixion, 902, 993-4, 1019, 1032-9, 1087-9, triumphal entry, 985-6, 1082b, universalism of, 970a, unwritten ministry, 867b, virgin birth, 891-2, 957, visits to Jerusalem, number of, 1075b, walks on sea,

1073b, washes disciples' feet, 1083, Water of life, 1076, woes on Pharisees, 989-91, and woman of Samaria, 1070-1, and woman taken in sin, 1076b, and women, 1040a
 Jesus ben Sirach and canon, 94b, 96b, 196b
 Jethro, 140a, 254a, 322b, visits Moses, 267
 Jews, assassination planned, 479b, in Babylonia, 459, 666b, 702-4, Egyptian, 119a, exclusiveness of, 847b, in exile, 70, Gentiles and, 790, glorification of, 773, Hellenism and, 847-9, Paul on, 1140-2, 1155-9, history of, 60-73
 Jewelry in O.T., 624a
 Jewish, apocalypses, 187-99, church and Christianity, 148a, church, its problem, 790a, community after Exile, 169a, Law, Jesus and, 897, 907b
 Jezebel, (1) Ahab and, 426a, Baal and, 167a, Elijah and, 66a, influence of, 66a, murdered, 432; (2) Jezebel at Thyatira, 1374a
 Jezreel, (1) Hosea's son, 760a, 761b; (2) Valley of, 55a, 364a
 Joab, 416a, Abner and, 75a, Absalom and, 148b, Amasa killed by, 408b, character of, 409a, David and, 399b, 408a
 Joash (Jehoash; but see also Jehoash), accession, 66b, reign of, 432b, 450
 Job, book of, 34b, 157a, parallels to, 120a, literary relations of, 487b, place in canon, 95b, 96a, problem of, 4b, 172a, Sheol in, 173, the "vindicator" in, 497b, wisdom literature and, 488a
Jobel (= jubilee), 295b
 Jochanan ben Zakkai, 840a
 Jochebed, 253a
 Joel, Day of Jehovah in, 180b, O.T. quotations in, 768
 Johanan, Egyptian Jews and, 119a
 Johannine problem, 888a, writings, language of, 883b
 John, (1) Baptist, 891, birth of, 1033-4, character of, 999a, death, 897a, disciples of, Paul and, 1122a, forerunner, testimony of, 1067-8, Jesus and, 892, 1039a, message, 958-9, ministry of, 1035b, preaching of, 1026a, questions Jesus, 973, testimony to Jesus, 1070b; (2) Elder, of Ephesus, 1065a, 1365b; (3) Hyrcanus and Messiah, 208a, 209b; (4) son of Zebedee, in Acts, 1098-1100, in fourth Gospel, 1063b; (5) for author of the Gospel, see under Fourth Gospel
 Jonah, Jesus and, 129a, 976a, message, 153b
 Jonathan, (1) the Levite, 373b; (2) Maccabæus, 192b; (3) Saul's son, David and, 392, 393, death of, 398, defeats Philistines, 390
 Joppa, Jonah at, 787b, Peter at, 1106-7
 Joram (see Jehoram, king of Israel)
 Jordan, Joshua crosses, 346b, 347b, Valley described, 56-7
 Joseph, 116a, (1) of Arimathæa, 1020b, 1090a; (2) of Cyprus, 1100a; (3) Jacob's son, brothers in Egypt, 244-5, dreamer, 243, in Egypt, 244, fidelity of, 219a, interpreter, 244b, Pharaoh and, 244b, Providence and, 147b, sold, 243, story of, 242-8; (4) Jesus' "father," 865a, 891b, 956b; (5) tribe, 781b, campaign of, 361a, in Egypt, 117a, Moses' blessing, 343b, territory of, 354a

- Josephus, O.T. canon and, 97, on O.T., 105b, and Pentateuch, 135a
- Joshua, (1) book of, 147b, origin of, 92b, and Pentateuch, 93b, omission from Torah, 134b; (2) high priest, 816b, Zerubbabel and, 824a; (3) leader of Israel, 267a, 322b, 323b, at Ajalon, 56a, battle-song of, 157a, character of, 345b, commission, 340b, farewell address, 355-6, Moses selects, 313b, spy, 303b, vision of, 348b
- Josiah, death at Megiddo, 69a, Deuteronomy and, 320-1, Law and, 138a, at Megiddo, 799a, reform of, 68-9, 92a, 169a, 810a, reign of, 437, 452, religion and, 677, Zephaniah and, 810a
- Jot and tittle, 955a, 963a
- Jotham, (1) judge, fable of, 365b; (2) king of Judah, reign of, 434a, 451a
- Joy, Paul on, 1241b, significance of, 1322b, in trial, 1331b
- Jubilee, (1) Book of, apocryphal, 193b, idea of God in, 201a; (2) year, 78a, 295
- Judæa, characteristics, 56, contra mundum, 829b, Galilee contrasted with, 12a, 842b, Rome and, 71b
- Judean Kingdom, history of, 423-38, 448-53, ministry of Jesus, 1061, 1065b
- Judah, (1) the nation, Assyria and, 67b, 650-1, 729, Babylon and, 798-9, chronology of (Southern Kingdom), 110-11, fall of, 69-70, Egypt and, 650-1, Israel and, 65, Micah on doom of, 793a, restoration of, 70, 112a; (2) son of Jacob and tribe, Joseph and, 245b, Moses' blessing, 343b, Tamar and, 243b, territory, 353b
- Judaism, Christ supersedes, 1315b, Christianity and, 446b, 886b, 1295-7, Ezekiel and origin of, 715a, Greek language and, 881a, Haggai and, 815, Hellenism and, 10b, 71a, 187b, 445b, in Matthew, 955, meaning and results, 169-73, origin of, 146b, 416b, 715a, post-exilic, 163b, 168b, 839-40, pre-Christian, 193a, 197b, sacred books and, 853a, superseded by Christ, 1317
- Judaizers, in Acts, 1118-9, Paul and, 940, 1111, 1197, 1207, 1217b, 1221, 1246a
- Judas, (1) Iscariot, betrayer of Jesus, 901a, 993a, 1075a, character of, 1016b, greed of, 1082a, replaced by Matthias, 1097a, unmasked, 1083b; (2) Maccabæus, 71b, 192b, and "Writings," 95b; (3) six others in N.T., 1361b
- Jude, epistle of, 854b
- Judge, Christ as, 1349, God as, 561-2, 754a, Messiah as, 182b
- Judges, of Israel, 357, 361-72, Moses appoints, 267b, 322a, sin of, 794b, unjust, denounced, 642b; Book of Judges, 147b, compilation of, 93b, theme of, 63b
- Judgment, in Amos, 777, in apocalyptic, 198a, 206-7, certainty of, 519, Day, Paul on, 1140-1, in Day of Jehovah, 769b, divine, in Zephaniah, 809-14, final, 208b, 725b, 1362, forms of in John's Revelation, 1379-80, by God, 621b, by Jehovah, 641b, Jesus' warnings of, 1077a, on nations, 827-8, parables of, 917b, 919a, in prophets, 172a, sin and, 202a, 684b, 793b, Solomon's, 417a, by Son of man, 992, of world, 683, 773b, of world in Isaiah, 649-50
- Judgments (=laws), 146a, 324b, 329a
- Judith*, Book of, 195b, 477b, idea of God in, 201a
- Jülicher on parables, 914b
- Julius, centurion, Paul and, 1131
- Junias, 1167a
- Jupiter, Barnabas taken for, 1112a
- Justice, 612a, administration of, 449b, demand for, 692b, 824a, Deuteronomy and, 320a, enjoined, 271b, 291b, 781a, God and, 161a, 188b, 492, 494a, 503b, meaning, 493a, poetic, 508, retribution and, 172a, suffering and, 174a
- Justification by faith, 1212a, James on, 1329b, Paul on, 937a, 1143a, Paul on reconciliation and, 1146-7

K

- Kab, measure, 79b
- Kadesh-Barnea, 117a, 322b, 352a, location, 254b, 304a, 308a, Israelites' journey from Kadesh to Moab, 307-17
- Kant on nature and moral law, 519a
- Karkar, 67a, battle of, 66a, 110a, 117b, 427b, 632a
- Karnak, 425a
- Kassites, origin of, 108b
- Kedar, Bedouin, 623b, 648b
- Keil on Pentateuch, 137b
- Kenaz, 361a
- Kenites, 361a, Israel and, 63b
- Kennicott's O.T. variants, 103b
- Kenosis passage, 1244-5
- Kethubhim* (=prophets), 91a, 134a
- Keturah, children of, 235b
- Key(s), of David, 1376a, power of the, 990a
- Khabiru* (=Hebrews?), 63a, 116b, 117a, 251b
- Khammurabi (see Hammurabi)
- Khons, god of Thebes, 195
- Kidron, brook, 56a
- Kinah meter, 652b, 709b, 780b
- Kindliness, religion and, 320a
- Kindness, 611b, to strangers, 1360b
- King, God as, 387b, Isaiah's ideal, 639b, 644, law of, 332a, Messianic, 181, 184, as priest, 451a
- King James Bible, 85
- Kingdom, (1) of evil, 206a; (2) of God, 201a, 207a, in apocalyptic, 172b, 189b, 207-9, future, 207b, Jesus and, 904b, 911-13, 966a, meaning, 893b, Messianic, 826b, origin of idea, 178a, in parables, 917a, in prophets, 152a, ultimate triumph, 747b; (3) of Heaven, meaning, 961a
- Kings, Books of, 149, compilation of, 94a; kings, relation to prophets, 412b; King's Week, 75a
- Kinsman (see also Goël), 378a
- Kiriath-jearim, ark brought to, 443a
- Kishon river, 54a
- Kiss, Judas', 1018a, symbol, 767a
- Kittel on Pentateuch, 137b, on Psalter, 514a
- Kittim (=Greece), 681b, 732a, 805-6
- Klausner on Jesus, 982b
- Klostermann on Pentateuch, 137b

- Knowledge, Christian, John on, 1358b, Christianity and, 1347a, of God, 201b, 384b, wisdom and, 607b
- Kodrantēs*, coin, value, 79a
- Kohath, family of, 355a
- Koheleth* (= Ecclesiastes), 614-6
- Koine* Greek, 864a, 880b
- Korah, (1) challenger of Moses, 305; (2) sons of, psalms, 509-10
- Koran, limitations of, 853a
- Korban (see also Corban), 279a
- L
- L, Gospel document, 870a, 873a, 955a, 1022b
- Laban, 235a, flocks of, 239a, Jacob and, 237-40
- Labor, Ecclesiastes on, 615a, songs in O.T., 155b
- Lachish, 699a, 793a
- Lachmann and Greek N.T., 861a
- Laish, capture of, 873b
- Lake of fire, 1396b
- Lamb of God, Jesus as, 1068a, in Revelation, 1378, 1388b
- Lamech, song of, 155b, 224b
- Lamentations, Book of, 157a, place in canon, 95a, 96a
- Laments and dirges, 156a, David's, 157a, Jesus' over Jerusalem, 991a
- Land laws, 295b, owners, 428a, tenure, customs of, 246b
- Landmark, 763b, law of, 333b
- Lange on monotheism, 127b
- Language, apocalyptic, 189a, 191a, literature and, 19b, of O.T., 99-100, origin of, 147a, 228a, Palestinian, 842-3, of prophecy, 152
- Laodicea, epistle to, 1225b, 1261b, John's letter to church in, 1376b
- Lapsing, peril of, 1307-8
- Last, days, 1051a, judgment, John's vision, 1395-6, last times described, 1287
- Last Supper, 1017, established, 901a, Jesus at, 1031, in Luke, 1054, and Passover, 875b
- Latin, Bible, 80a, 82a, 84a, 105a, church fathers, 865b, Mark's use of, 882a, versions of N.T., 865b
- Latter prophets, 93b
- Laughter, Luke's Gospel and, 1038b
- Laver(s), brazen, 275a, in Temple, 419b
- Law, the, canonization of, 92-3, and Christ crucified, 936, Christ supersedes, 1315b, contents of, 91a, discrepancies in, 139a, dominance of, 10b, and Exile, 143b, explanation, 455b, exposition, 325-39, Ezra and Nehemiah re-affirm, 473-6, final form of, 144a, of Holiness, 278a, 289-96, of Holiness, origin, 143b, hopelessness of, 935a, Jesus' attitude, 907b, Jesus supersedes, 933b, 962-3, Jewish attitude to, 524, Josiah finds, 68-9, in Judaism, 839, of liberty, 1333a, literature of O.T., 145-6, meanings for, 778a, meditations on, 584-5, and Messianic hope, 200b, moral, and God, 518b, of Moses, 17a, 134b, and N.T., 854a, Paul on, 935-6, 1212-6, in Pentateuch, 134b, and Pharisees, 841a, 989b, and prophets, 130b, 131b, purpose of, 326b, and rabbis, 843-4, a religious decline, 8a, results of keeping, 515, and salvation, 199b, and Samaritans, 93b, in LXX, 104a, and sin, Paul on, 1151-2, synonyms for, 524, 584b, temporary, 1309a, weakness of, 936b
- Lawbook, found in Temple, 437a, 452
- Law-courts, Christians and, 1178
- Lawlessness, Man of, 1272a, Paul on lawlessness, 1247-8
- Laws, miracle, 921a, for office-bearers, 331-2, of sacrifice, 279-83, of worship, 329-31
- Laying on hands, 279b, 281b, 1283a
- Lazarus, Jesus raises, 924a, 1080-1
- Leaders, faithless, 713a, oppose Jesus, 894, respect for, 1324b
- Leah, Jacob and, 238
- Learning process and Bible, 48-9
- Leaven, parable of, 917b, 978a, and Passover, 1178a, prohibited, 263a, 270b, 280b, symbolic, 1010a, 1029a
- Lebanon, 625a, location, 352a, "smell of," 767b
- Lebkamai, 707a
- Lectionaries, Greek, of N.T., 863a
- Legalism, Christianity and, 1211-6, conception of God in, 163-4, nationalism and, under Josiah, 678a, O.T. literature of, 145-9, origin of, 455b, post-exilic, 833a, religion of, 34-5
- Legion, 881b
- Lending, 330b
- Lent, origin of, 1037a
- Leopard, Daniel's vision of, 753b
- Leper, Jesus heals, 868b, 925a, 969b, 1001b
- Leprosy, 663a, regulations, 287-8, 336b
- Lepton*, coin, value, 79a
- Leshem, 354b
- Lessons, graded, 50a
- Letek, measure, 79b
- Letter(s), of Aristeas, 196a, in Bible, 25b, John's to the Seven Churches, 1372-7
- Levi, (1) Jesus' disciple (see also Matthew), 849b, 1002b; (2) tribe, choice of, 306a, duties of, 306a, Moses' blessing, 343b
- Leviathan, 490b, 492a, 557a, described, 507, metaphor of, 650b
- Levirate marriage, 244a, 291a, 337, 378b, 988b
- Levite(s), 299a, 332b, cities of, 316b, distinguished from priests, 443a, Ezekiel lowers status, 743b, Ezra appoints, 468a, function of, 320b, maintenance of, 476a, numbers and duties, 299b, the office, 170a, as priests, 131b, priesthood and, 373a, 699a, priests and, 139a, 290a, purification of, 300b, relation to Christ's priesthood, 1310-11
- Leviticus, 134, meaning, 278a, value of, 132a
- Lex talionis*, 75, 271a, 295a
- Libation, 410b
- Libertines, 1102b
- Libertinism, Paul on, 1179b, in Second Peter, 1346a
- Liberty, Christian, 1114-5, 1182
- Libnah, 431b
- Lice, plague of, 260b
- Lidzbarski, 115a
- Life, brevity of, 495a, Jesus on life from God, 910, Jesus on life with God, 908, Jesus on life with men, 909, transiency of, 535b, uncertainties of, 619b, worth of, 174, 616a

- Light, God as, 671b, Jesus as Light of world, 1077a, symbolic, 960a, 962b, 1252b, Paul on symbolism of, 1235
- Lightfoot on Stoicism, 850b
- Lily of the field, 624a
- Lion, Daniel's vision, 753b, Jehovah as, 766b, of Judah, 1378a, Nineveh as, 802a, symbolic, 369b, 683a
- Lions' den, Daniel in, 753a
- Lioness, Ezekiel's allegory, 726a
- Liquid measures in Bible, 79b
- Literature, Bible as, 3a, 19-25, of Dispersion, 190b, historical O.T., 147-9, language and, 19b, life and, 145, 165b, of N.T., 18, O.T. types of, 16-18
- Liturgy, in O.T., 447b, in Psalms, 170
- Loaves, miracles of, 1010a
- Locust, (1) carob bean, 1048b, John's diet, 286b, 999a; (2) winged insect, Amos' vision, 782a, in Joel, 768-9, 770-1, pest of, 780a, plague of, 261b, unclean, 286b, woe, in Revelation, 1382b
- Log, measure, 79b
- Logia* (=Sayings) of Jesus, 871-2, in fourth Gospel, 884a, in Synoptics, 904a
- Logos* (=Word), in fourth Gospel, 884a, 1066b, philosophy of, 947b
- Lollards, 80-1
- Lord, day of the, 911a, in early church, 946b, in Gospels, 986a, for Jehovah, 256b, Jesus as, 893b, 896a, 905b, 1071a, 1245a, 1197b, of hosts, 1370b
- Lord's brothers, identity of, 1327b; Day, in early church, 1371a; Prayer, 869b, 907a, 909a, 965-6, 1044a; Supper, in Acts, 1124a, in Luke, 1054-5, in N.T., 1325a, Paul on, 1170b, 1185-6
- Lost, doom of the, 1046b, meaning of being "lost," 971a, parables of lost sheep, coin, son, 1029b, "lost tribes," 118a
- Lot, (1) Abraham and, 229, incest of, 132b, Sodom and, 232-3; (2) casting lots, 274a, 479b, in Jonah, 787b, sacred, 388a
- Lotus, 507a
- Love, (1) human: Christ reveals, 1351a, Christian, 1353-8, Jesus on love, 909, Jesus on love for enemies, 964b, to God, 320a, 326a, 328a, "greatest commandment," 988b, in Hosea, 631a, law of, 1334a, law fulfilled in, 1161b; Paul on, 1187-8, perfect, John on, 1355b, power of, 627a, 937a, self-denial and, Paul on, 1163, in Song of Songs, 622-7, universal commandment, John on, 1354a; (2) Love of God, 6b, 906b, in Deuteronomy, 319b, in Hosea, 759-60, for Israel, 833b, universal, 787-90
- Love-feasts in Acts, 1098a
- Lovingkindness, God's, 170b, 175a, 673b
- Lower criticism, 129-30, 887a
- Lowland, the Palestinian, 360b
- Lowth on Hebrew poetry, 23a, 155a, 513a
- Loyalty, Daniel's theme, 748b, exhortation to, 1295a, to Jehovah, 159a
- Lucian, Origen and, 105a
- Lucifer, 645b
- Lucius of Cyrene, 1022b
- Lud, 732b
- Luke, (1) compilation of Gospel, 1023-4, date of Jesus' birth, 874b, discourse, amount of, 867b, Jesus' last journey in, 1042b, origin of Gospel, 856b, language of, 882b, "long omission" of, 871b, Mark used by, 868, method, 954b, narrative, amount of, 867b, parables in, 919, portrait of Christ in, 1025-33; (2) the man: author of Acts, 1094b, Paul and, 1262a, Philippi his home (?), 1238
- Lukewarmness, religious, 1376b
- Luther, biblical critic, 885b, on James, 1327a, Lutheran doctrine of Bible, 944b
- Luxury, Amos denounces, 775b, 781a, immorality and, 632b, in Israel, 66-7, result of, 641b, Solomon's, 423a
- Lydda, Peter at, 1106a
- Lydia converted, 1117a
- Lynch, T. T., on parables, 916a
- Lystra, cripple at, 927, and Derbe, Paul at, 1112a, 1116a
- LXX (see Septuagint)
- M
- M, Gospel document, 870a, 873a, 955
- Maccabees, (1) Books of, 192b, 196, idea of God in, 201a; (2) family, 192b, 840a, rebellion, 10b, 71, 112b, 758a
- Macedonia, evangelized, 877b, man of, Luke (?), 1238a, Paul called to, 1116b, Paul in, 940a
- Machærus, fortress, 973a, 978b
- Machpelah, cave of, 78a, 234b
- Magi, Jesus and, 958a
- Magic, 346b, 396b, at Ephesus, 1122b, example of, 722a, religion and, 292a
- Magicians in Babylon, 748b, in N.T., 11b
- Magnificat, Mary's 1025b, 1034a
- Magog, 741b
- Mahanaim*, 240a, 399a, 626b
- Maher-shalal-hash-baz*, Isaiah's son, 638a, 644a
- Mal'ach* (=messenger), 150a
- Malachi, meaning of word, 833a, relation to post-exilic life, 169a
- Malchus, Peter attacks, 1018a
- Malefactor, the dying, 1057b
- Malta, Paul on, 1132b
- Mammals, clean and unclean, 286a
- Mammon, meaning, 967a
- Mamre, 232a
- Man, in apocalyptic, 202-4, blindness of, 493b, creation and, 221a, Jesus' estimate of, 924a, nature of, 519b, relation to God, 500b, "of sorrows," Jesus, 183b
- Manasseh, (1) king, reign of, 68b, 436b, 451b, religion and, 677a; (2) tribe, territory of, 316b, 354a
- Manasses*, Prayer of, 193b
- Manger, Jesus born in, 1034b
- Manifestation of God, 268
- Manna, 266, 302b, the hidden, in Revelation, 1374a
- Manners in Bible lands, 73-6
- Manoah, his sacrifice, 131b
- Manual labor, Jewish approval, 1273a
- Manuscripts, N.T., 860-66, O.T., 102-3, Septuagint, 104a
- Mara*, meaning, 377b
- Marah, 265b
- Marana tha*, 883b, 1194b, 1248b, 1398a

- Marchesvan (=Bul), month, 77b
 Marcion, Luke's Gospel, 1056a
 Marduk, 120, 121a, 419a
 Mark, (1) Gospel: discourse, proportion of, 867b, language of, 882a, life of Jesus in, 12, Luke and, 868, Matthew and, 868, 953-4, narrative in, 867b, origin of, 856b, priority of, 871b; (2) disciple: Barnabas and, 1115b, in Gethsemane, 1018, home in Jerusalem, 1108b, Luke helped by, 1024a, Paul and, 1110a, 1261b, 1288b, Peter and, 1033b; (3) mark of Cain, 224b, mark on forehead, symbolic, 720a, mark of the Lamb, 1387b
 Marriage, in Bible lands, 76a, Christian, 1236-7, customs, 369b, 378b, customs in N. T., 1046a, God and Israel, 760a, metaphor of, in Paul, 1150-1, Paul's doctrine of, 1180-2, 1236-7, regulations, 290b, song, 538b, standard of, 610a, symbolism of, 1236a, 1394a, mixed, condemned, 476b
 Mars' Hill, Paul at, 1119
 Martha, character of, 1044a, Jesus, Mary, and 1081
Martyrdom of Isaiah, apocryphal, 196b, Stephen's martyrdom, 1103b
 Martyrs, in Apocalypse of John, 1366b, blessedness of, 1388a
 Mary, (1) Virgin: annunciation to, 1033b, at Cana wedding, 1069a, relation to Jesus, 1035a, virginity of, 891b; (2) Lazarus' sister, 1016b; (3) Magdalene, 896a, 1039b, Jesus appears to, 1090a; (4) mother of John Mark, 1096b
Mashal (=parable), 311b, 914a
Mashiach (=anointed), 181a
 Masius, Andreas, 136a
Maskil psalms, 509b
Massa (=burden), 645b, 694a
 Massacre in book of Esther, 482a
Massah (=tempting), 266b
Massebah (=pillar), 166a, 296b, 332a, 419a, 775b
 Massorah ("Tradition"), 102b
 Massoretes and Hebrew O.T., 100a
 Mastema, 206a
 Materialism, 789b
 Mattathias Maccabæus, 71b
 Matthew, (1) disciple, call of, 970b, 1002, 1026b, identity of, 891a; (2) Gospel, date of Jesus' birth, 874a, discourse in, 867b, language of, 882b, Mark and, 868, 953-4, narrative in, 867b, origin of, 856b, parables in, 919
 Matthew's Bible, 84b
 Matthias, replaces Judas, 1097a
 Mazarin Bible, 860b
Mazzebah (see Massebah)
Mazoth (=unleavened bread), 263a, feast of, 331
 McFadyen on Psalter, 513b
 Meah, tower of, 471a
 Meal-offerings, regulations, 280, 283a
 Measure in Revelation, 79b
 Measurements in Bible, 79
 Meats, Paul on, 1162, 1258, Paul on, offered to idols, 1182
 Medeba, 353b
 Mediæval church, religious education in, 47a
 Mediation, angelic, 819b
 Medical terms in Luke, 882b
 Medicine, suspicion of in O.T., 449b
 Mediums, 332b
 Meek, 672a, Jesus on, 961a
 Meekness, 1203a
 Megiddo, 55, 111a, 420b, excavations at, 114b, Josiah killed at, 69a, 437, 799a
Megillah, Megilloth (=roll, rolls), 134a
 Melchizedek, 401b, Abraham and, 229b, 230a, type of Christ, 1309-10
Melek (=king), 292a, 669b
Melis (=interpreter), 150a
 Melito, Bishop, 91a
 Melkart (Baal), 66a, 426a, shrine of, 419a
Memra (for Logos), 1066b
 Menahem, Assyria and, 67b, Tiglath-pileser on, 118a, usurper, 433a
Mene, mene, 752b
 Mephibosheth (see Ishbosheth, Meribbaal), David and, 402b, 408a
 Merciful, Jesus on, 961b
 Mercy, of God, 574b, 713b, 906b, 907a, in Jonah, 787-90, Paul on, 1159a, parables of, 919b
 Mercy-seat, 272b
 Merenptah, 109a, 251a, 252a, and exodus, 116b, and Hebrews, 61b
Meribah (=striving), 266b, 307b, location, 254b, waters of, 561a
 Meribbaal (see also Mephibosheth), 409a
 Merikere, Instruction of, 536b
 Merneptah (see Merenptah)
 Merodach-Baladan, 111b, Hezekiah and, 436a
 Merom, Waters of, 56b, 352a
 Merris, Moses and, 253b
 Merx on Pentateuch, 137b
 Mesha of Moab (see also Moabite Stone), 66a, 99b, 110a, 117b, revolt and defeat, 430a
 Meshach, 751a
 Meshech, 732b
 Mesopotamia, 139b, 229b
 Messenger, of God, 364a, 835, of salvation, 661b
 Messiah, Aaronic, 193a, 198a, in Acts, 1111a, in apocalyptic, 198b, 199a, 209-10, 845-6, conception of, 9a, 181-6, David and, 402a, false, 1015a, in fourth Gospel, 1082-3, functions of, 210, in Haggai, 815b, in Isaiah, 639, 644a, 645b, 654a, 664-5, 667a, Jesus as, 898a, Jesus as, in Acts, 1097b, judgment and, 207a, kingdom and, 172b, Matthew and, 956b, in Micah, 792a, 796a, in O.T., 209a, prophecies not mentioning, 181a, in Psalter, 515b, 580, titles of, 210a, in Zechariah, 820a, 823b, 826a, 827a
 Messiahship of Jesus, 905b, 1019a
 Messianic, age described, 641, 650a, 651, 675b, hope, 177-186, 932b, hope and Law, 200b, king in Haggai, 818b, promises, 178-81, prophecy in Ezekiel, 725a, 738b, woes, Jesus on, 1054a
Metatron, 845a
 Meter in Hebrew poetry, 154-5
 Methodism and Scripture, 945b, 949a
 Methuselah, 193b, 225b
 Micaiah, Ahab and, 150b, Jeremiah and, 700a, message of, 428b

- Micah, (1) prophet, 34a, Isaiah and, 638b, message of, 153a, and Messiah, 182b, times of, 67a; (2) Danite, owner of graven image, 372b
- Mice, 386b, Assyrian army and, 636a, pestilence and, 436a
- Michael, archangel, 196b, 748a, 756a, 846a, 1362b, 1386a, function of, 205a, the "prince," 204b
- Michal, 392b, 399b, David and, 401
- Michmash, victory at, 389b
- Midian, Israel and, 62a, Moses in land of, 253-4, origin of, 235b
- Midianite(s), Gideon and, 363-5, Israel and, 314-5, origin of, 254a
- Midrash*, 315a, 355a, 371a, 980a
- Migdol, 264b
- "Mighty God," Isaiah's prophecy, 182a, Jesus' mighty works, 896
- Mikram* psalms, 509b
- Milcom, 367b, 422a, 811b, 778a
- Mile, length, 79b
- Miletus, Paul's address at, 1124b
- Millennium, 199a, 846b, 1269a, blessings of, 208a, meaning, 207a, in Revelation, 1395
- Millo, 400b, identification, 117b
- Millstone(s), 262a, 336b
- Mina, value, 78, weight, 79a
- Minchah* (= meal-offering), 280a
- Miniscule codices of N.T., 861-2, MSS., meaning, 860a
- Minister, Christian, ideals of, 1282b, the ideal, 834b, Paul on, 1200a, unfaithful, doom of, 833-4
- Ministry, Jesus', 893-9, duration of Jesus', 875, orders of, 1277-8, training for Christian, 1276-7
- Miracles, in Acts, 927-9, 1095b, apostolic, means of, 930b, at Cana, 1068b, Christ the greatest miracle, 929, definition of, 921a, of disciples, 926-7, Elisha's, 430-1, faith and, 925-6, God and, 163b, in Gospels, place of, 922, in Jonah, 788, of the loaves, 1073, in O.T., 132a, 351b, prophecy and, 330a, prophets as the O.T. miracle, 121b, rationalistic explanation, 923-4, Schweitzer on, 32b, as signs, 921-2, technique of, 924-5, typical miracles of Jesus, 969-70
- Miraculous, in Matthew, 954a
- Mirage, 652b
- Miriam, 253a, 265b, Moses opposed by, 303a
- Misery, Job's, 491b
- Mishnah* (= tradition), 91a, 98a, beginnings of, 456a
- Mishpat* (= judgment), 608a
- Missionary, book, Jonah, 790, journeys, Paul's, 939-40, purpose of N.T., 858b, spirit, 320b, tours of the Twelve, 1040b, work of early church, 877b
- Missions, Acts and, 1094a
- Mite, value, 79a, widow's, 1014b, 1053b
- Mithredath, 460a
- Mizar, the hill, 538a
- Mizpah, 352a, 367a, 375a, name, 240a
- Mnason, disciple of Jesus, 1033b
- Moab, Amos' judgment, 778a, Israel and, 118a, 309-12, 323a, 731a, Hills of, described, 58b, Isaiah's prophecies, 647a, Jehoram and, 66a, Jeremiah's oracle, 705b, Moses and, 322a, origin of, 233a
- Moabite Stone, 99b, 101b, 115a, 117b, 425b, 778a, described, 430a, and Omri, 116a
- Modern, biblical criticism, motives of, 885b, biblical view, 48b, meanings in Proverbs, 609-13, world and Jesus, 998a
- Moffatt on dates of Jesus, 874
- Mohammed and Judaism, 416b
- Molech (= Moloch) worship, 212a, 291a, 292
- Monarchy, institution of, 131a, problems of, 416
- Money, in Bible, 78, love of, 794-5
- Monogamy in N.T., 605b
- Monolatry, Moses and, 159b
- Monostich, poetic, 155a
- Monothelism, 8a, 9a, 201a, 326a, in Amos, 776b, angelology and, 204b, Christianity and, 852, Genesis and, 127b, in great religions, 128a, of Israel, 122b, Lange on, 127b, of O.T., 159a, of Paul, 1265a, prophets and, 161b, in Psalter, 170b, in Zechariah, 831b
- Monsters in Revelation, 1383a
- Montanism, 389a
- Months, Jewish, names of, 77b
- Monuments, testimony of, 121b
- Moon worship, 165b, 166a
- Moral order, 520a, 799a, 804, 806, 832b, 1398a, in Chronicles, 440b, and history, 403
- Morality, Christian (see also Conduct, Ethics), Paul on, 1219-20, penalties and, 320b
- Mordecai, Esther and, 477-82
- Moreh, oaks of, 329a, 366a
- Morning star, Christ as, 1398a
- Mortar, Egyptian, 252b
- Mosaic Law (see also Law), 17a
- Moses, Aaron opposes, 303a, Assumption of, apocryphal book, 198b, as author, 249b, 321b, birth and adoption, 253, blessing of, 155b, 243-4, call, 254, 258-9, character and work, 62, Christ, relation to, 1303b, commission, 255, 258-9, and cuneiform, 115, date of, 251b, death, 313b, 343a, 344b, discourses of, 318-9, 322-40, faith of, 1320-1, father-in-law, 139a, 141b, 159a, golden calf, 276, Hebrew religion and, 145b, images and, 161a, intercession, 304b, 328a, Jehovah and, 166a, Jesus and, 1067b, judges appointed by, 322a, lawgiver, 166b, mediator, 325b, Messiah and, 181b, in Midian, 253-4, Miriam opposes, 303a, name, meaning of, 253b, and Pentateuch, 134-44, 146b, Pharaoh and, 257-8, prayer of, 323-4, priesthood and, 372a, religion of, 133b, song of, 155b, 265, 340-42, story of, 253-77, Ten Commandments and, 145b, at transfiguration of Jesus, 1042a, and writing, 100b, 115, 315b
- Moshelim* (= balladists), 156b
- Mote in eye, 967b
- Motherhood, 286b
- Motives, 328b
- Moulton on N.T. Greek, 881b
- Mountains, Israel's history and, 588a, of Judæa, 56
- Mourners, professional, 687a, 780b

- Mourning, 76a, customs, 479b, Jewish, 619a, of priest, 292b, regulations, 330a, renders unclean, 285
- Mouse, symbol of pestilence, 636a
- Multitudes, Jesus feeds, 979
- Murder, expiation, 334a, Jesus on, 963
- Music, of O.T., 154, in Temple, 445b
- Musri, 421b, 431b
- Mustard-seed, parable, 917, 977b, 1006a
- Mutilations, 292a
- Myrrh, 275a, 624a, 667b
- Myrtle, 821a
- Mysteries of nature, 506-7
- Mysterium tremendum*, 539b
- Mystery, (1) of God's designs, 619b, of Gospel, 1173a, 1256b, in Pauline epistles, 1231b; (2) Mystery Religions, 851-2, 1341b, and N.T., 889a, and Paul, 1145b, 1174, 1258b
- Mystical union, 1199a, 1204a, 1220a, 1229b, 1251a, 1256b, 1259a, 1294b
- Mysticism, 389a, in fourth Gospel, 1064b, in John, 1355b, Paul's, 938b, 1205b, 1228b, 1264b
- Myth, John's use of, 1385b, and Spirit of God, 125b
- Mythology, history and, 369a, in O.T., 368b
- N
- Naaman, healed, 430b
- Nabal, David and, 395
- Nabataeans, 671b, 784b
- Nabi* (= prophet), 150a
- Nablous, Samaritans at, 103b
- Nabonidus, 111b, 752a, Cyrus and, 458b
- Nabopolassar, 111b, 437a, Nineveh taken by, 798b
- Naboth's vineyard, 428
- Nadab, 313a, reign of, 425a, sin of, 285
- Nahum, Jeremiah and, 799b, 802b, message of, 153a, the name, 799b
- Nain, widow of, 924a, 1038b
- Name, significance of a, 231b, 295a, 393b, 714b, 745b, 793a, 1098b, 1099b, 1157a, 1228a, 1374a, 1376a, significance of God's, 300b, 557a, of Jesus' in Acts, 1098b
- Names, Hebrew, 222a, of God, 201a, 485b, symbolic, in Hosea, 760a
- Naomi, return of, 379b, Ruth and, 377-80
- Naphtali, for Galilee, 54b, Moses' blessing, 344a
- Narrative(s), of Bible, 21, material in Gospels, 867, of O.T., early, 147
- Narrow and broad way, 968a
- Nathan, David and, 401-2, 403, 443b, prophet, 152b, weakness of, 416a
- Nathanael, call of, 1068b
- Nation, deliverance for, 532, good of, 448b, prayer for, 563, religion and, 389b, righteousness and, 423a
- Nationalism, in Esther, 478a, Ezra enforces, 468-9, of Joel, 770b, under Josiah, 678a, of prophets, 180a, 181a
- Nationalists, Jesus and, 933a
- Nations, Jehovah's debate with, 655a, judgment on, 813a, moral law and, 799b, Noah, father of, 227b
- Natural man, Paul on, 1175a
- Nature, God and, 158b, 164a, 165a, 523b, 575a, 599-601, miracles of Jesus, 925b, in O.T., 9a, in Proverbs, 604b, in Psalter, 170b, transformation of, 831a, reveals God, 518b, wonders of, 505-7
- Nazarene, meaning, 958b
- Nazareth, Jesus' childhood at, 958b, Jesus' discourse at, 1025a, 1026a, 1036a, Jesus rejected at, 869a, 897b, 1007b
- Nazirite(s), vow, 300, 369a, 778b, degradation of, 712b, Paul keeps vow, 1121a
- Nebhiim* (= prophets), 64a, 91a, 134a
- Nebo, (1) Mount, Moses at, 313b; (2) Babylonian god, downfall of, 658a
- Nebuchadrezzar, 111b, 195b, dream, 749b, 751, Egypt and, 734-5, inscriptions and, 118b, Jerusalem captured by, 70a, 438, 701-2, 748b, the name, 452b, Necho defeated by, 69a, spelling, 102a, submission to, 695-6, Tyre and, 731b
- Necho, Pharaoh, 111b, at Carchemish, 437b, at Megiddo, 69a
- Necromancy, 181b, 332b
- Needle, eye of, 984b
- Negeb, the, 8b, 141b, described, 56b
- Nehemiah, governor, 70b, leadership of, 169a, the man, 455, 457-8, memoirs of, 4b, patriotism of, 472, prays for Jerusalem, 469, prophetic tradition and, 94a, returns to Jerusalem, 470, second visit to Jerusalem, 475b, his work, 457-8
- Neighbor, in apocalyptic, 198b, meaning, 291b, meaning in N.T., 988b
- Nemesis in history, 807a
- Neo-Cæsarea (= Philadelphia), 1376
- Nephesh* (= breath, soul), 140a, 167b, 173b, 202b
- Nepioi* (= babes), 975a
- Neriglissar, 111b
- Nero, as Antichrist, 1387a, as Beast, 1388a, persecutes Christians, 1339a, 1365b, in Revelation, 1392b
- Net-mending, 1000b
- Nethinim* (= slaves), 464b
- New, covenant of Jeremiah, 175b, 180b, earth, 675b, 683b, 1396a, heart, 180a, heaven, 675b, Jerusalem, 672a, 821, 1368, 1396-8, life in Christ, 1347b
- New Testament, apocrypha and, 200b, autographs lost, 860b, backgrounds, 10-12, books of, 15b, Christ and, 27a, Christ interpreted in, 46a, criticism, special problems of, 888, dates of, 874-9, divisions of, 15, early church and, 946-8, geography of, 11b, 12a, Greek of, 23b, growth of, 853-9, hortatory elements of, 24b, inspiration and, 889, Jesus and, 46, language of, 859b, 880-4 the Law and, 854a, literature of, 18, MSS., families of, 861b, miracles, 921-30, missions and, 858b, occidental book, 77a, O.T. allusions in, 97a, O.T. criticized by, 132b, O.T. influence on, 853-4, political conditions in, 11a, O.T. inferior to, 28b, 49a, O.T. unitary with, 175-6, preservation of, 860-6, prophecy and, 854a, religious conditions in, 11b, study of, 10-14, varying values in, 949b, witness to a life, 949b, worship and, 858b
- Newman, on certainty, 949b, on development of doctrine, 39b
- Nicene Creed, 944a

Nicodemus, interviews Jesus, 1069b, pleads for Jesus, 1076b
 Nicolaitans, teachings of, 1372-3, at Thyatira, 1374b
 Nicolas de Hereford, translator, 81b
 Nile, discoloration of, 260a
 Nimrod, Assyrian, 227b, land of, 796a
 Nineveh, despoiled, 801-3, fall of, 69a, 118b, 437b, 810b, in Jonah, 787a, Nahum on fall of, 798-802
 Nisan (= Abib), month, 77b
 Nisir, mountain, 120b
 No (= Thebes; see No-Amon), 735b
 Noah, (1) Apocalypse of, 198a; (2) his blessing, 155b, character of, 226, drunkenness, 132b, 227a, faith of, 1320a, genealogy, 225a
 No-Amon (= Thebes; see No), 802b
 Nob, priests of, 394b
 Nobleman, servant of, healed, 969b
 Nomadic life, 74-6, 224a
 Non-resistance, effects of, 1342a, Jesus on, 909b
 Noph (= Memphis), 735b
 North, doom from, 686b, foe from, 683b, 685a, home of gods, 505b, 540b, 733b, significance of, 716a, symbol of danger, 681a, 741a
 Northern Kingdom (see also Israel), 148a, chronology of, 110-11, history of, 423-5, in Hosea, 759b, overthrow of, 67, 434a
 Northerner, meaning in Joel, 772a
 Number of the Beast, 1388a
 Numbers, (1) Book of, character, 134; (2) Bible numbers, 464b; (3) symbolic numbers in Daniel, 756b
Nunc Dimittis, 279a
 Nuptial songs, 622b

O

Oak, sacred, 356b
 Oaths, 347a, forbidden, 964a
 Obduracy, 327b
 Obedience, 328a, benefits of, 326, blessings of, 296, 338a, Christian, 1353b, enjoined, 324, rewards of, 327a, to rulers, 619b, to word of God, 1332b
 Obelisk, 419a, of Shalmaneser III, 117b
 Oblation, meaning, 279a
 Oboth, people of Israel at, 309a
 Occident and N.T., 77a
 Occupations of Palestine, 59
 Oded, prophet, 451a
 Offering(s), Christ's own, 1317-8, regulations, 279-83, 313-4, of tribal heads, 300b
 Office-bearers, laws of, 331-2
 Officials, church, 1289
 Og of Bashan, 323b
 Oholah and Oholibah, sins of, 729-30
 Oholiab, 275a
 Oil, sacred, 625b
Olah (= burnt-offering), 279a
 Old age, Ecclesiastes on, 621a, God's support in, 553
 Old Testament, apocalyptic and, 192a, apocrypha of, 104a, apocryphal books in, 191a, archaeology and, 114-21, authority among Jews, 98b, backgrounds, 5-7, books of, 15a, books of, chronological order, 7b, 8a, canon, final ratification, 97-107, Christ in, 181-6, Christianity and, 124a, 853b, 1103,

1105b, 1300a, 1317-8, codes, 321, compilation in, 381a, compilers of, 412b, covenants, 175a, criticism of, 129-33, dates in, 108-13, 125-6, divisions of, 15, 149, early Christians and, 853b, ethics of, 502b, evil spirits in, 205b, excavations and, 114-21, folk-poetry of, 155-6, formation and growth, 91-8, future life, 173-4, God, conception of, 158-64, grace in, 175a, growth of, 130b, historical literature of, 3-5, 147-9, history, 5, history, sources of, 147b, history, value of, 132a, inerrancy of, 105-6, inferior to N.T., 28b, Jesus' use of, 905a, labor songs in, 155b, law-literature of, 145-6, literary types in, 16-18, manuscripts of, 102-3, in Matthew, 955b, 975b, miracles in, 132a, moral deficiencies of, 132-3, music and, 154, N.T. citations from, 97a, N.T. a critic of, 132b, N.T. influenced by, 853-4, 887b, oriental character, 77a, parables in, 156b, 915a, poetic books and literature, 154-7, poetry, rhythm of, 154-5, proverbial sayings in, 156-7, pseudepigraphical books, 191a, religion, stages of, 200a, religious value of, 131a, 346, 439-40, revelation progressive, 133, riddles in, 156b, salvation, conception of, 174-5, science and, 122-8, sin and, 174b, songs of, 155-6, stories, relation to apocrypha, 193-5, suspected books, 98a, study of, 5-10, text of, 102-4, theism of, 158-64, transmission of, 99-107, unique elements, 121, unity with N.T., 175-6, universe, conception of, 124-5, value of, 219b, versions, 103-5, wisdom literature of, 154-7, writers, 101a, writing methods, 485-7
 Olive trees, (1) allegory of, Paul's, 1158b, symbolism of, in Revelation, 1384b, Zechariah's vision, 822b; (2) Mount of Olives, 985b
 Omar, Mosque of, 447a
 Omer, measure, 79b
 Omissions, in Gospels, 869b, in O.T., 102a
 Omnipresence of God, 160b
 Omniscience of God, 595, of Jesus, 129
 Omri, accession, 65b, on Assyrian monuments, 117b, on Moabite Stone, 116a, reign of, 65b, 425b
 On (= Heliopolis), 735b
 Onan, 243b
 One, the year 1 A. D. erroneous, 874a
 Onesimus and Paul, 1292-4
 Onesiphorus and Paul, 1286a
 Onias, murder of, 756b
 Onkelos, Targum of, 103a
 Only-begotten, 1067b, 1070a
 Ono, 472b
 Onyx, 501b
 Ophel (= Zion), excavations at, 114b, 117a
 Ophir, gold of, 501b
 Oppression, 618a, denounced, 778a, 806b, of Israel in Egypt, 252
 Optimism, in Revelation, 1367a, in Zephaniah, 809a
 Oracle in Temple, 418a
 Oral, law, 456b, prophecy, 152a, tradition, 91b, 92a, tradition and prophecy, 94a, transmission, 100b, transmission of Gospel, 871b

- Ordeal, 300a
 Ordination, 1283a
 Oreb, 365a
 Orient and O.T., 77a
 Oriental mind, 147a
 Origin, 164a, canon and, 97b, creed, 948a, and Epistle to Hebrews, 1297a, Hexapla of, 104-5
 Origins, in Genesis, 219-25, of Israel, 108
 Orpah, 377a
 "Orphan" psalms, 511a
 Orr on Pentateuch, 137b
 Orthodoxy, in early church, 947b, Hebrew, 484, James on, 1334a, Job and, 489a, tenacious, 124b
 Osnappar (= Ashurbanipal), 466a
 Ostrich, 506b
 Othniel, 357a, story of, 362a
 Outpouring of Spirit, 180b
 Oven, the Hebrew, 764a
 Overseer (see Bishop)
 Ox, 506b
 Oxyrhynchus papyri, 864a
- P
- P, Pentateuchal "priestly" document, 137-41, 218a, 298b, creation in, 219-221, date, 142-3, miracle in, 132a, style, 140b, theology of, 141a
 Pacifism, 701a
 Paddan Aram, 140a, 237
 Padi, governor of Ekron, 68a, 634a
Pedagogus of Clement, 46a
 Paganism and Christianity, 886b
 Pagan religion, 11b
Paidagogos, Law as a, 1215
 Pale horse and rider, 1380a
 Palestine (see also Canaan), 52-9, apocrypha and, 188b, a battle-field, 52b, buffer state, 734a, climate and rainfall, 58-9, earliest history, 60a, Egypt and, 116b, excavations, 114b, extent, 52, geographical divisions, 53-8, geology, 53, location, 52, occupations, 59, physical and economic features, 73-6, plains of, 53-4, social and political organization, 74a, western highlands of, 54-6
 Palestinian apocalyptic, 191
 Palimpsest, meaning, 863a
 Palm, a measurement, 79
 Paltiel, 399b
 Pan-Babylonian theories, 115a
 Pandora, box of, 620a
 Paphos, Paul at, 1110a
 Papias, on Mark, 997a, on Matthew, 955b, on N.T. language, 880a
 Papyrus, Elephantine, 119a, fragments of N.T., 863b, N.T. Greek and, 881a
 Papyrus reed, 253a, 492b, uses of, 860a, 863b
 Parable(s), comparative table of, 915, Dives and Lazarus, 1049b, in Enoch, book of, 198a, Good Samaritan, 1043b, great supper, 1047b, husbandmen, 1053a, interpretation of, 4a, of Jesus, their realism, 73a, of Jesus, their reason, 997a, 1005-6, Jewish use, 914-5, Jonah a, 788b, of losing and finding, 1029b, 1048, meanings of, 311, 914a, Nathan's, 403-4, in O.T., 156b, 915a, Pharisee and publican, 1051b, of pounds, 1052b, of prayer, 1044b, of rich fool, 1045b, of seed, 1005-6, sower, 1040a, transmission of, 918a, of unjust judge, 1051b, of unjust steward, 1049
 Paradise, location, 1050a, meaning, 212b
 Parallelism in Hebrew poetry, 155a, 513a
 Parallels, Gospel, 867-70, to O.T. literature, 120a
 Paralytic, Jesus heals, 1002a
 Paran, location, 302a, 304a
 Pardon, prayer for, 541-3
 Parental authority, 334b
 Parents and children, 610b, Paul on, 1236b, 1260b
Paroimia (=parable), 914a
Parousia (=Second Coming), 992a
 Parthia and Rome, 1379b, 1383a, 1391a, 1392b
 Particularism in apocalyptic, 202a
 Parties in the church, warning, 1335b
 Partridge, 690b
Pascha (=Passover), 881b
 Paschal lamb, 263b
 Pashhur, 691b
 Passion, Jesus predicts his, 1042a, passion week, events of, 900-2
 Passive, endurance, 1179a, resistance, 964a
 Passover, 165b, date, 77b, Egyptian Jews and, 119a, festival, 294a, 331, five celebrations in O.T., 467a, instituted, 262-3, and Last Supper, 901a, 1016a, 1017a, number of in Jesus' ministry, 875, observation of, 348b, the second, 301a
 Pastoral preaching, 43a
 Pastorals, the epistles, 942, language of, 883b, order of writing, 1276a, term, 1274
 Paterson, W. P., on rule of faith, 949
 Patros, location, 735a
 Patience, 712a, enjoined, 505a, need of, 1337a, place of, 806b, of the saints, 1389b
 Patmos, John and, 1365b
 Patriarchal age, archaeology and, 116, blessings, 155b, stories, 147b, 219a
 Patriarchs, character, 193b, faith of, 1320b, God's care of, 576b, Hebrew and Babylonian, 120b; Testaments of the Patriarchs, apocryphal, 198
 Patriotism, encouraged, 618b, Esther's, 481b
 Patron angels, 205a
 Paul, in Acts, 857a, on Adam and Christ, 1147-8, before Agrippa, 1129b, on Antinomianism, 1247-8, and apocalyptic, 847a, at Antioch with Barnabas, 1107b, apostleship real, 1210a, on asceticism, 1258-9, at Athens, 1119, authority of, 1177a, Barnabas befriends, 1105b, at Berea, 1119a, on body, sanctity of, 1179, at Caesarea, 1125b, at Caesarea, imprisoned, 1128b, character, 934-5, and Christ, 37-8, on Christ's cosmic relations, 1253-6, on Christ and the Spirit, 1197b, 1243a, on Christ's self-emptying, 1244-5, on the Christian society, 1232-6, on circumcision, 1141b, on conduct, Christian, 1268-9, the church, 937-9, closing years, 941-3, collection for poor, 1126a, conversion, 877a, 934-6, 1104b, 1127b, 1130a, conversion, date of, 876b, conversion, ensuing events, 1209-10, conversion, providential, 929a, at Corinth, 1120-1, and Corinthian church, 1200-1, Corinthian laxity rebuked, 1177-9,

- the Cross in, 1143b, 1147b, dates of events in life, 878, death threatening, 1286a, 1288, defends his apostolic office, 1197-1200, defends himself against false charges, 1267, on discipline, 1178a, on disorders in Corinthian church, 1184-6, emotion in, 1217, at Ephesus, 1121a, at Ephesus, mobbed, 1123, epistles of, 13a, 854b, ethics, 1160-4, 1345, on faith, 1135b, on false teachers, 1277b, and Felix, 1128-9, and Festus, 1129b, first missionary journey, 877-8, generosity enjoined, 1202, Gentiles and, 1165, Gentile Christians and, 1113b, Gnosticism replied to, 1250-1, his gospel, 936-9, 1209-10, and Greek tongue, 881a, on hope, Christian, 1154, imprisonments, 1117a, 1275, Jerusalem mob addressed by, 1127, from Jerusalem to Rome, 878, visits to Jerusalem, 876b, and Jesus, 37a, 931-2, Jesus interpreted by, 904a, Jesus' teaching and, 1160b, 1164, at Jesus' trial (?), 1056b, on the Jew, 1155-9, on the Jew's moral status, 1140-2, and Judaism, 848b, and Judaizers, 111, and Law, 1212, on Law and sin, 1151-2, language of, 883, letters of, occasional, 883b, letters, survey of, 940-3, life and work, 13a, 931-50, on Lord's Supper, 1185-6, love, hymn of, 1187-8, at Lystra, heals lame man, 1112a, Macedonia and Greece revisited, 1123b, on marriage, 1180-1, messages of, 13b, Miletus, address at, 1124b, miracles of, 927, missionary journeys, 877-8, 939-40, mobbed in Temple, 1126b, on morality, Christian, 1219-20, and Mystery religions, 851b, mysticism of, 1205b, on new life in Christ, 1228-30, and O.T., 132b, 1287b, parables of, 916a, Pastors, revealed in, 1276a, persecutions endured, 1105, Peter rebuked by, 1211b, at Philippi, 1116-8, 1238, and Pisidian Antioch, 1110-2, on preaching Christ, 1173, his psychology, 1252a, on resurrection, 902b, 1190-3, 1198-9, on resurrection of Christ, 930a, on righteousness of God, 1138-40, 1143-4, on ritual cleanness, 1182-4, Roman citizen, 1118a, 1128a, and Roman world, 12a, at Rome, 1133-4, Sanhedrin and, 1128a, Saul changed to Paul, 1110a, second missionary journey, 1115-21, self-defense against false charges, 1195-7, 1202-6, shipwrecked, 1132, Silas, co-worker, 1116a, on sin, Christian freedom from, 1148-50, "slave" of Christ, 1138a, on Spirit and Christ, 1197b, 1243a, on Spirit, life in, 1152-3, on the State, 1161, Stephen and, 1103b, Tarsus, returns to, 1106a, terms used, 941a, theology of, 910a, Thessalonian church and, 1263-4, at Thessalonica, 1118, third missionary journey, 1121-6, on toleration, 1162, on "tongues," 1188-90, tribulations of, 1204b, training and privileges, 1246a, voyage to Rome, 1131-3, on works, 1334a, on wrath of God, 1139-40, writing, method of, 860b
- Paul of Tella and Origen, 105a
- Paulinism, 13b, doctrines of, 1224a
- Peace, Messiah and, 182, 184b, in Proverbs, 613a, source of, 486b, universal, 795, 827a, 1304-5
- Peacemakers, Jesus on, 962a, psalm of, 533b
- Peace-offering, 169b, regulations, 280b, 283b, significance, 780b
- Pearl, parable of, 917b, 978a
- Peasant life, Palestinian, 67a, 74-76
- Pekah, usurper, 67b, 433b, Rezon and, 434b, 633a, Tiglath-pileser on, 118a
- Pekahiah, 67b, 433b
- Pelethites (=Philistines?), 64a
- Pen of iron, 690b, or reed, 864a
- Penalty, for apostasy, 682b, for irreligion, 684a, penitence induced by, 763b
- Penitence, 830a, forgiveness and, 767b, of Job, 507b, in Luke's Gospel, 1048b, penalty inducing, 763b, psalms of, 535b, 590b, 597, restoration and, 826b
- Pentastich, poetic, 155a
- Pentateuch, 345a, contents of, 134, discrepancies in, 138-9, Divine names in, 138, formation of, 124, 138-9, Graf-Wellhausen theory of, 137, influence of, 628a, Moses and authorship, 115, 135, 146b, origin and development, 134-44, post-Mosaic elements in, 141-2, repetitions in, 138-9, Samaritan, 103b, LXX translation, 93b, style and language, 140b, term, meaning of, 134a, theology of, 139b, 140-1, value of, 144
- Pentateuchal criticism, 136-7, documents, chronological order, 142, documents, differences in, 139-41
- Pentateuchos*, the term, 134a
- Pentecost (Weeks), feast of, 294, 331b, Spirit at, 180b, 772b, 928b, 1097, term, meaning of, 270b
- Penueel, 365a, Jacob at, 240b
- "People of the land" (= am-haaretz), 436b, 721b
- Peor, 312b
- Peræa, Jesus' ministry in, 899a, 983b, 1029b, 1080a
- Peræan source of Luke, 872b
- Perdition, son of, 1086b
- Perfection, Christian, 1247b, 1352a, moral, 964b, steps to, 1331a
- Pergamum, Caesar-worship at, 1365a, John's letter to church at, 1373b
- Pericopæ* (woman taken in adultery), 988b, 1076b
- Peril(s), prayer for deliverance, 529, Proverbs on moral, 607b
- Perjury, 333b
- Perizzite, 255b, 350b
- Persecution, apocalyptic and, 188b, of early Christians, 1338, endurance of, 1267b, Jesus on, 962a, of Jews, 192b, Paul explains, 1271a, predicted in Revelation, 1380a, reward of enduring, 1343b
- Perseverance, Christian, 1347b
- Persia, apocalyptic and, 188a, 201b, under Cyrus, 458b, 460, dates for O. T. study, 112a, Esther, book of, and, 477, etiquette of, 480a, Israel and, 71, 148a, Jews and, 477-8, Joel and, 768, Judah and, 70b, and resurrection, 211a
- Person of Christ in N.T., 39b
- Personal, culture, 611-12, experience and Gospel, 1353a, religion in Psalter, 171a
- Personality, Bible and, 176a, God and, 164b, of God, 158

- Personification, in Bible, 22b, of Wisdom, 157b
Peshitta, Syriac N.T., 106b, 865a
 Pessimism, apocalyptic and, 190b, Christianity opposes, 911b, in Ecclesiastes, 616b, Greek and Hebrew, 489b, Job's, 492a, in Zephaniah,
 809a
 Pestilence, angel of Lord and, 118b, census and, 411, Sennacherib's army and, 635b, as "Death," 1380a
 Peter, as author, 1339a, call of, 1026a, 1036b,
 1068b, confesses Christ's sonship, 897b,
 980, 1010-1, 1041a, Cornelius and, 928-9,
 1106b, delivered from prison, 928a, 1108a, denies Jesus, 902b, 1017b, 1019a, 1032a, 1055b, 1088a, Eneas cured at Lydda, 1106a, epistles, 854a, 855a, at feet-washing, 1083,
 in fourth Gospel, 1063b, and Gentiles, 940a, 1113b, 1211b, Herod imprisons, 1108a,
 Jesus rebukes, 1075a, Jesus warns, 1084a,
 Jesus welcomes back, 1091-2, and John in Acts, 1098-1100, at Joppa, 1106a, in Mark, 992b, Mark's source, 997, in Matthew, 955b, miracles of, 927, mother-in-law healed, 970a,
 1001a, names of, 842b, Paul rebukes, 1211b,
 Pentecost sermon, 1097b, prophecy and,
 181b, the "rock," 898b, 1004b, Tabitha restored by, 1106a, walks on sea, 980a, writings ascribed to, 1346b
 Pethor, 310a
 Petra, location, 57b
 Petrie on the Exodus, 116b
 Petrograd, MSS. at, 102b
Petros (=rock), 980b
 Phallicism, 166b
 Phanuel, function of, 205a
 Pharaoh, 252b, (1) and Hebrews, 61b, 109a, 250b; (2) Hophra, Ezekiel's oracles against,
 734-6; (3) Necho, 798b, Assyrians and, 118b
 Pharisee(s), 198b, 840-2, apocalyptic and,
 188b, character, 10b, 894b, on Fate, 1156a,
 Jesus and, 934b, 1078b, Jesus' woes on,
 989-91, 1045, John Baptist and, 959a, limitations of, 40b, origin, 456a, publican and, parable, 1030b, 1051b, tradition and,
 932b
 Philadelphia, John's letter to, 1375b
 Philemon, (1) epistle, 854a, authorship of, 1223, message of, 942a; (2) convert of Paul, 1292a
 Philip the evangelist, 1103b
 Philippi, apostles imprisoned at, 928a, city of, 1238a, "a colony," 14, church, condition of, 1240b, divining maid of, 927, Paul at, 1116-7
 Philistia, judgments on, 773, 777b, plain of, excavations, 114b
 Philistines, David and, 400b, David defeats, 443b, early Israel and, 63b, Hebrews and,
 147b, Israel and, 385-6, Jeremiah's oracle on, 705a, origin, 60b, 264a, Palestine and,
 52a, in Palestine, 109b, princes of, five, 54b,
 Samson and, 370b, united Israel and, 64a
 Philo, canon and, 97a, on creation, 123a, and Epistle to Hebrews, 1305b, and fourth
 Gospel, 1066-7, and Genesis, 203a, God, idea of, 202b, on Jews, 848b, on O.T., 105b, and Pentateuch, 135a, on Sabbath, 849a, on Septuagint, 847a, 849a
 Philopater (Ptolemy IV), 192b
 Philosophers, Paul on false, 1267a
 Philosophy, 11b, Christianity and, 944a,
 Colossian, 1252, Gnostic, John on, 1350-1,
 Hebrew, 171b, and Hebrews, epistle to,
 1295-6, of life, in Ecclesiastes, 615b, Paul's,
 938b
 Philoxenus, 865a
 Phinehas, 385a, and plague, 312b
 Phoebe, Paul commends, 1167a
 Phoenicia, 52b, 54a, coinage of, 78a, Israel and,
 65b, judgment on, 773, people of, 373b, script or writing of, 115b, Sennacherib attacks, 634a
 Phoenix, myth of, 574a
 Phylacteries (see Tephillin), 326b, 989b, 1387b, wearing of, 1381a
 Physician, Luke, 1023a
 Piety, Jewish, in exile period, 674a
 Pilate, Jesus and, 902a, 993, 1019, 1056, 1088-9
 Pilgrim, psalms, 586-93, song of, 690b
 Pillar(s), of cloud, 264a, of fire, 264a, at Gezer, 119b, sacred, 238a, 271b, 327a, 329b, symbol, 762b, symbolism of, in Revelation,
 1376a, Temple, 418a, 446b
 Pishgah, location, 312a, Moses at, 324a
 Pit (= underworld), 536b
 Pithom, 61b, 252b, location, 250b
 Pits, water, 689b
 Pity, of Jehovah, 772a, Jesus on, 961b
 Placating God, 796b
 Plague(s), census and, 444a, of Egypt, 259-262,
 John's vision of, 1390-1, stories of, 132a
 Plain, Esdraelon, 55a, Jezreel, 55a, Philistia, 54
 Plan of God unchangeable, 190a
 Plato, Epistle of Hebrews and, 1296a, 1313a, idea of God, 164a, his ideal state, 1397a,
 the universal in, 164b
 Platonism, 196a, apocalyptic and, 203a, in N.T., 857b
 Play in Proverbs, 609a
 Pleasure in Ecclesiastes, 614b, quest for, 617a
 Pledges, 336b, custom of, 778b
 Plenary inspiration, 27b
 Pleonexia (=covetousness), 1235a
 Pleroma (=fullness), 1228, 1232b
 Plooij on Theophilus, 1022a
 Plowshares, 795b
 Plumb-line, Amos' vision, 782a
 Pneuma (=spirit), 1070a
 Poetic literature of O.T., 154-7
 Poetry, in Bible, 20a, 23, 154-5, 602, of Job, 485a, in prophecy, 152, in psalms, 513a
 Pogrom, 479b
 Political conditions of N.T., 11a
 Politics and prophets, 152a
 Polity, early church, 1359-60
 Poll tax, 474b
 Polycarp, martyrdom of, 1373a
 Polygamy, 291a, in O.T., 133a, 605b
 Polyglot Bible, 103a
 Poly-Jehovism, 159a
 Polytheism, 11b, early Hebrews and, 159a
 Pomegranate, 627a
 Pool, of Bethesda, miracle at, 1072, of Siloam,
 436b
 Poor, exploitation of, 791a, "of the land," 74a, legislation on, 270b, in Luke, 1034a, 1038a,

- in Messianic age, 182b, in Psalter, 554, in spirit, 960b, treatment of, 330b
 Portrait of Christ in N.T., 859a
 Post-exilic Judaism, 163b
 Potiphar, 244
 Potter, God as, 493b, 1156b, in Jeremiah, 691
 Pound, value, 78b, weight, 79a
 Pounds, parable of, 1031a, 1052b
 Poverty in Proverbs, 602b
 Power, deification of, 806a, of God, 160, 162a, 494a, Jesus', 896a
 Praetorian guard, 1242b
 Praise Psalms, 598-601
 Prath (= Euphrates), 689a
 Prayer, answer to, 384, of Azariah, 194a, censer and, 1382a, in Chronicles, 440b, Daniel's, 750a, 753a, David's, 444, for dead, 192b, for deliverance, 560, 573, 711b, Ephraim's, 697b, Habakkuk's, 807b, helpfulness of, 797b, Hezekiah's, 435a, importunity in, 968a, Jeremiah's, 689-90, Jesus and, 1035b, Jesus' highpriestly, 1086-7, Jesus on, 908b, 965b, 986b, 1044a, the Lord's, 965-6, of Manasses, 193b, for mercy, 673-5, a morning, 517, of Moses, 323-4, Nehemiah's for Jerusalem, 469, parables of, 918a, 919b, 1030b, 1051b, for pardon, 541-3, Paul enjoins, 1280b, for Peter's release, 1108b, Solomon's dedicatory, 420, 447
 Preacher, in Ecclesiastes, 616b
 Preaching, apostolic, 1304-5, Bible and, 39-44, scholarship and, 41-2, scorned, 793b
 Pre-biblical literary fragments, 21a
 Predestination, Paul and, 941b, 1156a, 1159b, 1226
 Prediction, apocalyptic and, 189b, 190a, of Christ in O.T., 853b, prophecy and, 152a, prophets and, 654b
 Pre-existence, of Christ, 937b, 1067a, 1244-5, 1254a, Jesus' claim of, 1078a, 1087a, of Messiah, 182b, 846b, of soul, 197a, 203a
 Prehistoric period, 147
 Prejudice, power of, 378a
 Preparation, for Christ, 9b, 886b, 1000a, for Christianity, 848-51
 Presbyter (see Bishops)
 Presbyterianism and Scripture, 945b
 Presence of God, 299b, 595
 Presumptuous sins, 281a
 Pride, denounced, 807a, downfall of, 736a, of place, Jesus on, 989b, of power, 706b, rebuked, 752a, rebuked by Paul, 1176b
 Prideaut on Pentateuch, 137b
 Priest(s), Christ as, 1305-12, consecration of, 274, dues of, 332b, duties of, 384a, duties of, in Ezekiel's ideal Temple, 743-4, false, 795a, garments of, 273b, as historians, 17b, influence of, 10b, in Joel, 768b, Levites and, 139a, 290a, 299b, 443a, Messiah as, 184, the nation as, 672a, prophet and, 170a, 684b, in religion, 34, regulations, 292-3, responsible for irreligion, 521a, and sacrifice, 131b, support of, 306b, unfaithful, 763a, 833b
 Priesthood, of believers, 1370b, development in O.T., 170a, legislation, 273-4, membership, 131b, Paul's conception of, 1165b
 Priestly benediction, 300b, Code, 139a, 146b, 278a, 454a, Code, origin of, 92-3, 462b, Code, significance of, 126a
 Primitive, church, experience of, 1100a, ideas of Jehovah, 166, prophecy, 152b
 Primogeniture, 334a
 Prince, in Ezekiel, 183b, of Peace, 182a, 184b, 827
 Prisca (= Priscilla; see also Aquila), 1121b, author of Hebrews (?), 1297b
 Prison, 320b, deliverances from, 927-8
 Privilege, penalty and, 778b, responsibility and, 1155-6
 Problem of evil in Job, 483-4
 Prodigal son, parable of, 1048b
 Profanity, 269a
 Profit in life, 614b
 Progressive revelation, 6, 8a, 29a, 39b, 49a, 133
 Proletariat, Amos and, 779a
 Prologue, Ecclesiasticus, 93b, 94b, fourth Gospel, 1064a, Job, 485b
 Prometheus and Job, 489a
 Promise(s), to Abraham, 178a, to discouraged, 824b, God's, for help, 657a, Messianic, 178-81
 Property laws, 295b, 333
 Prophecy, apocalyptic and, 153b, 172a, 189-90, 844, Christ in, 1099a, decline of, 830b, false, 150-1a, fulfillment of, 826b, 829b, 1393, 1398, fulfillment in Christ, 1301a, Hebrew, 167-9, history and, 1381b, interpretation of, 1348a, in Matthew, 956a, and N.T., 854a, and oral tradition, 94a, origin, 5b, spirit of, 302b, the term, 345a, tests of, 333a, 1356b
 Prophesying, 393a
 Prophet(s), 34, canonization of, 93-5, character, 16b, 17b, and contemporary life, 798, 809-10, and Deuteronomy, 146, the disobedient, 424, and ecstasy, 167a, 389a, enemies of, 801a, false, 692a, 794b, false, Ezekiel and, 722, false, Jeremiah on, 693b, false, Jesus on, 968, the False, in Revelation, 1387b, former and latter, 93b, and freedom, 423b, God, doctrine of, 161-3, Huxley on, 122a, inspiration of, 428b, and Jehovah, 159b, Jesus and, 907b, and Josiah's reform, 452a, kings, relation to, 412b, Law and, 130b, 131b, message of, 151b, 832b, Messiah as, 181b, minor, 94b, O.T. religion and, 130b, 165b, originality of, 120a, 121b, priest and, 170a, 684b, proof of, 330a, Psalter and, 170b, qualifications of, 775a, and reformation, 169a, responsibility of, 737b, and righteousness, 163a, sacrosanct, 69b, and social conditions, 791, sons of, 388b, their times, 5b, true, 693b, 794b, types of, 332-3, and war, 178b, writings of, 150-3, and Zadokites, 193a
 Prophets (= prophets), 150a
 Prophetic, conception of God, 454a, element in historical books, 149, guilds, 429-30a, language, 152, literature, 16b, 150-3, prophetic certainty, perfect tense of, 516b, 671a, 673b, 735b, 1385a, 1392b, religion, 34-5
 Propitiation, Christ a, 1143b, 1353b
 Prose, in Bible, 21, and poetry in Bible, 20a, 23, 154b

- Proselytes, provision for, 668b
 Proselytizing, Jesus on, 990, and Judaism, 847-8
 Prosperity, dangers of, 326b, Job's, 501b, religion and, 441a, as reward, 327a, righteousness and, 770a, of wicked, 498
 Prostitutes, sacred, 776a, temple, 167a
 Prostitution, 335b
 Protection, God's, 534b, 586b
 Protestantism, Bible and, 41, 47b, 944-6, and dogma, 47b
Protevangelium, 177b
 Proto-Luke, 873a, meaning, 1023-4, 1062a
 Proverb, meaning, 156a
 Proverbs, Book of, 156, 157b, in canon, 96a, messages of, 9a, setting of, 5b; Proverbs of Solomon, 156b
 Proverbial sayings in O.T., 156-7
 Providence, 188b, 327a, doctrine of, 805a, of God, 341b, 504b, and history, 416b, 441b, and Joseph, 147b
 Pruning hooks, 795b
 Psalms, (1) Book of, authorship, 512b, in canon, 95b, character, 17a, formation of, 510a, a hymn book, 157a, influence of, 628a, pilgrim songs in, 7a, religion of, 170-1, and prophets, 170b, the term "psalter," 509a, themes of, classified, 513-4, 600b, titles explained—maskil, miktām, mizmōr, etc., 511-2; (2) Babylonian and Egyptian, 120a, imprecatory, 6b, outside Psalter, 510-1, of Solomon, Book of, 197b, Messiah in Psalms of Solomon, 210a
Psalmi, meaning, 509a
 Psalter, 475a, 561a, 750b
 Pseudepigrapha, meaning, 188a, O.T. books, 191a, value of, 175b
 Pseudonymity and Scripture, 1346b
 Psychology, Hebrew, 165a, 167b, and healing miracles, 926a, and inspiration, 151b, Paul's, 1152a, 1175b, 1234a
 Ptolemies, 827b, dates of, 112b
 Ptolemy IV (Philopater), 192b; Ptolemy Philadelphus and LXX, 103b; Ptolemy Soter, 619b
 Publicans, 894b, 1002b
 Publius, Paul and, 927, 1133a
 Pul (= Tiglath-pileser III), 632a, land of, 676b
 Pulse (vegetables), 749a
 Punishment, 324b, borne for others, 662-3, David's, 403, as discipline, 178a, future, 206-7, 212, in Hosea, 760b, inevitable, 1391b, Israel's, 780, for sin, 188b, 223a, 342a, 392b, 450b, 640b, 765-6
 Pun(s), in N.T., 1294a, in O.T., 680b, 694a, 765b, 767a, 781b, 793a
 Pupil and religious education, 48-50
 Purification through suffering, 1343
 Purim, feast of, 477, 482
 Puritanism, Zephaniah's, 810a
 Purity, enjoined, 1374b, of heart, 962a
 Purpose of God, 160b, 246a, 319b, 576b, 1378b, in Christ, 1154b, 1222b, 1225b, 1231-2, finished, 1383b, secure, 753b
 Purvey, John, 81b
 Put, 732b
 Pythagoras, 123a
 Q (= quelle), Gospel source, 868, 871-2, 904a, 954b, Christology of, 1043b
 Quails, 266, 302b
 Quakers, on Bible and Spirit, 946a
 Quarrelsomeness rebuked, 1335-6
 Queen, of heaven, 685b, of Sheba, 421
 Quirinius, census of, 874b, 1023b
 Quotations, in N.T., 854a, in O.T., 21a
 R
 Raamses, city of, 61b, 263a, 250b, 252b
 Rabbi, Rabban, Rabboni, 456a, 881b
 Rabbinical, exegesis, Paul's use of, 1184a, 1189a, 1206b, 1218a, scholars and O.T., 130b, thought, 843-4
Raca, meaning, 963b
 Race prejudice, Christianity and, 1106b, 1208b, removal of, 1104a
 Rachel, death of, 242a, Jacob and, 238
 Rahab, spies and, 347; Rahab, symbol for chaos, 492a, 566a, 661a
 Rain, early and latter, 59a, 328b, 772b, Palestinian, 58-9
 Rainbow, Noah and, 226b, symbolism of, 1378a
 Rainy season, 624b
 Ram, Daniel's vision, 754b
 Ramah, location, 56a
 Rameses II, 109a, 250b, 252a, his city of Rameses, 117a, and the Hebrews, 61b, the Pharaoh of the oppression, 254b; Rameses III, 117a
 Ramman-Nirari III, 433a
 Ramsay, on date of Jesus' birth, 874b, on dates in Paul, 878
 Ransom, of Gomer by Hosea, 762b, Jesus as, 906a, 1013b, legislation on, 271a
 Rape of Shiloh, 375b
 Raphael, archangel, 195a, function of, 205a
 Raphia, 54b, battle of, 633b
 Rationalism, miracles and, 923-4
 Raven(s), 506b, Elijah and, 426b
 RD, meaning, 345b
 Realism and Jesus, 35
 Reason, function of, 196b
 Rebekah, Isaac and, 235
 Rebel, the sinner as, 174b
 Rebellion, in heaven, 205b, punished, 640b
 Rechabites, 432a, 775b, aims of, 66a, and wine, 699b
 Recompense, God's, 504a
 Reconciliation, to God, 396a, 1251a, ministry of, 1199-1200, in Paul, 937a, 1146-7, 1255a, in N.T., 410a
 Recorder, meaning, 417a
 Recording angels, 205a
 Recreation, Proverbs on, 609
 Red Heifer ritual, 307a; red horse and rider, 1379b; Red Sea, 62a, 132a, crossing the, 264
 "Redactor," in fourth Gospel, 1065a
 Redeemer, God as, 259a, Job's, 497b
 Redemption, 1054a, the Cross and, 1213b, as emancipation, 1253a, in Luke, 1035a, in Paul, 937a, 1143a, in Peter, 1341a
 Redemptive love of God, 906b, 1377-9
 Reed (=rod), measurement, 79
 Reform, Asa's, 449, Ezra-Nehemiah's, 473-6, Josiah's, 68-9, 320-1, 452

- Reformation, (1) Protestant, Bible and, 47b, 124a, 136a, 944-6, and N.T. criticism, 885b; (2) encouragement to, 450b, prophets and, 169a
- Refrains, 155a
- Refuge, (1) cities of, 271a, 317, 325a, 333, 354b; (2) God as, 518, 519b, 539, 546a, 567-8
- Regeneration in N.T., 1341b
- Register of returned exiles, 464
- Rehob, location, 304a
- Rehoboam, 424b, folly of, 65a, northern tribes lost by, 423b, reign of, 448b
- Rehum, 466a
- Reins, O.T. usage, 496a
- Rejection not final, 584b
- Release, year of, 330b
- Religion, apocrypha and, 200-13, behavior and, 1329b, Bible and, 3, 15-18, in Bible lands, 76b, of Canaan, 166b, culture and, 611-13, of David, 407a, in Deuteronomy, 319a, of early Hebrews, 62a, after Exile, 169-73, externalizing of, 387a, in Genesis, 224a, and geography, 5a, 6b, a growth, 145, and Hebrews, 144b, history and, 71-2, 298a, 359-60, 372a, 413b, 439-40, Hosea's conception of, 759, institutional, 34-5, 715a, inwardness of, 1008b, of Israel, 71-2, 165-76, of Israel between Testaments, 187, Jesus' idea of, 907-10, Jesus on formal and vital, 965-9, Jerusalem the center of, 68a, under Josiah, 677, in Judges, 360a, and life, 908b, in Micah, 791b, 796b, of O.T., early, 115b, 116a, in O.T. historical books, 149, in O.T. songs, 156a, prophetic and institutional, 34-35, prosperity and, 361b, 389b, in Proverbs, 603, 612b, of Psalter, 170-1, 509a, purposes of, 1315a, results of true, 676a, science and, 122a, symbols and, 179a, tradition and, 379-80
- Religious, (1) conditions of N.T., 11b, development in Israel, 8a, education, aims, use of Bible and other material, 45-51, education in Proverbs, 607-8, externality, 678a, failure, Jeremiah on, 681-3, faith, Jonah's, 789b, indifference, 832a, life, in Amos, 775b, value, of O.T., 131a, 346, 359-60, 382a; (2) religious values in Chronicles, 445-6, 452, in Ecclesiastes, 616a, in Esther, 477, in Genesis, 218b, in Job, 488b, in O.T., 378b, 415, 439-40, in Proverbs, 608-13
- Remembering God, 327
- Remiel, function of, 205a
- Reminiscence in fourth Gospel, 1069b
- Remission, meaning, 999a
- Remnant, doctrine of righteous, 722b, in Amos, 780, 783b, in Isaiah, 168a, 434a, 637b, in Micah, 792a, in Zechariah, 829b
- Remorse, terrors of, 1389b
- Rendel Harris on Logos, 1066b
- Renewed heart promised, 739b
- Repentance, 340, blessing and, 324b, call to, 771, 820b, 493b, in Jeremiah, 678b, Jesus' call to, 906a, 1029a, 1046b, in Joel, 770a, John's call to, 892b, in Luke, 1037a, meaning of, 959a, 999a, of Nineveh, 787b, and restoration, 667a, no second, 1308a, 1323b, 1358a, sham, 682a
- Repetitions, in O.T., 102a, in the Pentateuch, 138-9
- Rephaim, 60a, 323a, 400b, Valley of, 647a
- Rephidim, water at, 266b
- Reptiles, 286b
- Respect of persons, 694a
- Responsibility, 336b, corporate, 350a, Ezekiel's doctrine, 725, individual, 168b, 737b, prophet's, 737b, for sin, 1139b
- Rest of God's people, 1304a
- Restitution, 282b, 300a, 472a, Jacob and, 147b
- Restoration, from exile, 464-5, 652a, in Hosea, 760b, of Jerusalem, 699a, of Judah, 70, of Judah, archaeology and, 118-9, in Micah, 795-6, promised, 340a, 697
- Resurrection, 203a, apocalyptic and, 190a, 198a, 210-13, 845b, body of, 1248a, of Christ, 930, 931b, 1229a, in Daniel, 748a, 758b, the first, 1395b, general, 1268-9, of Jesus, 902-3, 994-5, 1020-1, 1033a, 1058-9, 1063b, 1090-2, of Jesus, in Acts, 1096, in Judaism, 164a, and millennium, 208b, in O.T., 173-4, 210b, 740b, Paul on, 1170a, 1190-3, 1198-9, Sadducees and Jesus, 988
- Retaliation, 271a, 391a, evil of, 909b, law of, 295a
- Retribution, 171b, 193a, 450b, certainty of, 823a, future, 618a, Haman's hanging, 481, in history, 811-13, in Joel, 771-2, in O.T., 442b, in Psalter, 534b, prayer for, 569-70, for sin, 765-6, suffering and, 498b
- Return, (1) Christ's, 991b, in fourth Gospel, 1084-5, in Paul, 1182a; (2) from exile, 459, under Ezra, 460b, under Nehemiah, 461a, promised, 173, 661b
- Reuben, Joseph and, 243b, 245, Moses' blessing, 343b, territory, 315
- Reuel, 254a, 302a
- Re-union, Israel's, 682b
- Revelation, (1) apocalyptic and, 189a, attestation of, 30a, Bible and, 3, in Christ, 29a, by ecstasy and vision, 1367, experience confirming, 30, of God in Christ, 886b, 1300, of God's mind, 693b, in history, 131a, 168b, 853a, at Horeb, 324, Jesus and, 36-37, Jesus the climax of, 1011b, manifoldness of, 15, meaning of, 29-30, method, 29-30, 168a, 643a, and O.T., 217a, progressive, 6, 8a, 29a, 39b, 49a, 133, 237a, 428, 935b, in Scripture, 628b, through prophets, 151-2; (2) Book of John's, 18b, origin and purpose of, 858a
- Revenge, Jesus on, 964, law of, 75
- Reverence, 328a, 612a, 907a, for God, 319b
- Revised Version, advantages of, 4b, 85-6, and poetry, 154a, use of, 629b
- Reward, Jesus on, 962a, of righteousness, 581, of virtue, 392b
- Rezon of Damascus, 67b, 110a, Pekah and, 434b, 633a, 643b, Solomon opposed by, 422a
- Rhoda, Peter and, 1108b
- Rhythm, in O.T. poetry, 154-5
- Riblah, 437b
- Rich, subservience to, 1333, tyranny of, denounced, 1336b, young ruler, 984
- Riches, dangers of, 869a, 1377a, Jesus on dangers of, 984b, 1028b, 1045b, disappointment in, 618a, in Ecclesiastes, 615a, failure

- to enjoy, 618b, parables on, 918a, 919b, use of, 611a, 1284b, worship of, 1393b
- Riddle, in O.T., 156b, Samson's, 370a
- Righteous, destiny of, 836, man, described, 515a, man, reward of, 581, man, stability, 603b, security, 491
- Righteousness, in Amos, 631a, and Christianity, 1347a, demanded, 641a, divine, 791b, divine, in Romans, 1138-40, 1143-4, of faith, 936, final victory over evil, 1393b, forensic term, 778b, of God, 163a, 170b, 491a, 814, Jesus illustrates, 965-7, and Messiah, 182, in N.T., 961b, in O.T., 10a, 174b
- Rime in O.T., 154b
- Riotous living, 609a
- Ritual, in Chronicles, 441a, in codes, 146b, in Joel, 771a, Paul on ritual cleanness, 1182-4, religion and, 390b, 832a, righteousness and, 824a, of Temple, 169-70
- River, of Egypt, 54b, Jordan, described, 57a, of life, in Ezekiel, 744b, of life, in Revelation, 1397a
- Rizpah, 410a
- Robbing God, 832a
- Robinson, Edward, explorer, 114a
- Rock, God as, 342
- Rod, Moses', 307b, of wrath, 711b
- Rods, Paul beaten with, 1204b
- Ro'eh* (=seer), 150a
- Rogers, R. W., on Sennacherib, 118b
- Roll, the term, 95a, 134a, in Ezekiel, 717a, Jeremiah's, 700, manuscripts, 863b, Zechariah's vision, 823a
- Roman Catholic Church, Bible and, 80-5, doctrine and, 946, tradition and, 944a
- Roman, empire and early church, 1115-34, governors, 11a, religion, 1365a, world and Paul, 855b
- Romans, Epistle to, message of, 941
- Rome, Christians and, 1161a, Christianity and, 1365, church at, 1135a, doom of, in John's vision, 1392-3, Israel and, 148a, government, method of, 11a, and the Jews, 840a, and Luke, 857a, and Mark's Gospel, 996a, in Revelation, 1391-2
- Roof, 334b
- Rose of Sharon, 54a
- Rosetta Stone, 114a
- Royal Psalms, 569-72
- Ruach* (=anger, spirit), 167b, 176a, 202b, 365a
- Rubbish heaps and MSS., 864a
- Rubies, 501b
- Rubrics in Leviticus, 278b
- Rudiments, in N.T., 1257b, meaning in Paul, 1216a
- Rufus of Rome, 1167b
- Rule of faith, 949, in early church, 948a; rule of God, 911a
- Ruler, rich young, 899b, 984, 1052a
- Rulers, obedience to, 619b, psalm for, 572b
- Ruth, Boaz and, 377-8, the foreigner, 380a, Naomi and, 377-8; Book of Ruth, place in canon, 95a, 96a
- Ryle, on Book of the Law, 93a, on date of prophetic canon, 95a, on early revelation, 91b
- Sabæans, 490a
- Sabaoth, Lord of, 1336b
- Sabbatarianism, 1258b
- Sabbath, Christianity prepared for by, 849b, creation and, 221a, doing good on, 1047a, festival, 294a, instructions concerning, 274-5, Jesus on, 895a, 907b, 1003a, Jesus heals on, 1072b, 1078b, journey, distance of, 79b, legislation, 474b, 691a, before Moses, 77a, observance, 269a, 670b, observance, difficulties of, 476a, significance of, 726b
- Sabbatical year, 270a, 295
- Sacerdotalism in Paul, 1165b
- Sackcloth, 479b, 683a, 783a
- Sacrament, 901a
- Sacramentalism, in Ezekiel, 168b, false, 1325, Paul and, 941a, 1145b
- Sacred books, function of, 853a, times and seasons, 1269a
- Sacrifice, animal, regulations, 290, in Bible lands, 74a, Christ's, the ideal, 1314-7, in codes, 146b, discrepancies in legislation, 131b, after Exile, 169b, and Exile, 130b, expiation and, 409b, a gift, 175a, of heart, 541, human, 234b, infant, 119b, Jeremiah on, 685b, laws of, 279-83, legislation, 273-4, meaning, 384-5, prophets and, 162b
- Sacrificial love, Ruth's, 377
- Sadducees, 840-2, and canon, 95a, character, 10b, Jesus and, 900a, limitations of, 40b
- Sadika* wife, 365b, 367a, 369b
- Sahidic Coptic N.T., 865a
- Saints, meaning, 1138a
- Salathiel apocalypse, 199b
- Salem (=peace), 230a, 557b
- Salome, (1) daughter of Herodias, 978b; (2) wife of Zebedee, 1013a
- Salt, covenant of, 74b, 280a, 306b, eating, 466a, metaphor of, 1012b, sown with, 366b, uses of, 962b
- Salutation, 971b
- Salvation, Christian, process of, 937a, a gift, 910b, Jesus' teaching on, 904b, Law helpless, 934a, meaning of, 568b, mediation of, 178a, messenger of, 661b, in O.T., 9a, 174-5, in O.T., its universality, 649b, by a Person, 934a, present and future, 1227, righteousness and, 1139a, 1143, scope of, 1340-1, and Scripture, 949, theme of Romans, 1136a
- Samaria, (1) city, Amos' judgment on, 779a, Assyria and, 729, capture of, 68a, doom of, in Micah, 792b, excavations, 114b, fall of, 110b, 434b, 633b, founded, 425b, Sargon captures, 465b, Shalmaneser and, 118a, siege by Syria, 431a, site and surroundings, 779a; (2) the region, 55b, Jesus in, 899a, Philip in, 1103b
- Samaritan, parable of good, 1014b, 1027b, 1043b, leper, the grateful, 1030b, 1051a, Pentateuch, 101b, 103b, people, origin of, 465b, religion, 458a, 669b, schism, 71a, 112a, temple, 440b, 448b, woman, 181b, 1070-1
- Samaritans, conversion of, 934a, Jesus spurned by, 926b, Jerusalem, rebuilding opposed by, 471, Judæans and, 450b, and Law, 93b, origin of, 118a, and Temple, 818a

- Sammael (=Satan), 204a
 Samson, 357b, character of, 372a, story of, 368-72
 Samsu-ditana, 108b
 Samuel, (1) Books of, 147b, a compilation, 94a, 381-2; (2) prophet, birth and call, 384-5, character of, 381, 389, prophetic office, 152b, sacrifice of, 131b, story of, 384-9
 Sanballat, 472b, Nehemiah and, 461b, 470b
 Sanctification, meaning, 1340b, in Paul, 937a
 Sanctify, the ceremonial, 347b
 Sanctuaries, local, 139a
 Sanctuary (=Temple or shrine), building of, 277b, central, 115b, 355a, 414, of Danites, 372-3, the heavenly, Christ as, 1312b, instructions on, 274-5, prayer for the, 591-2, in wilderness, 272-3
 Sanhedrin, apostles and, 1101b, Jesus and, 1018-9, Jesus' trial before, 1056a, Paul before, 1128a, Peter and John before, 1099b, powers of, 11a, scribes in, 456a, Stephen before, 1103a
 Sapphira and Ananias, 1100-1
 Sapphire, 501b
 Sarah, Abimelech and, 233, the angels and, 232a, death of, 234b, in Egypt, 229a, Hagar and, 231a
 Sarai (see also Sarah), 231b
 Saraquel (=Sariel), function of, 205a
 Sardis, church in, John's letter, 1375a
 Sardius, 1377b
 Sargon, 110b, 111a, 111b, 648a, Israel and, 118a, Samaria captured by, 68a, 118a, 435a, 465b, reign of, 633b
 Satan, binding of, 1395a, bound by Jesus, 1029a, cast from heaven, 1386a, casting out of, 1043a, and demons, 202a, final overthrow of, 1368b, god of this world, 1198a, Jesus and, 7a, 893a, 1004-5, Job and, 483-4, 487a, 490a, names for, 206a, in O.T., 205b, origin of idea, 444a, power of, 1177b, and sin, 203, synagogue of, 1373a, in Zechariah, 820a, 822a
 Saul, (1) king, age at accession, 102a, Amalekites and, 132b, anointed, 387b, career of, 147b, character, 382a, chronology of reign, 109b, David and, 391b, David spares, 394-5, death of, 397-8, 442b, at Endor, 396-7, his failure, 148a, and Gibeonites, 409b, jealousy of, 392b, and prophesying, 167a, his reign, 64a, his rejection, 391, sons hanged, 132b, story of, 387-98; (2) of Tarsus (see Paul)
 Saviour, Christ as, in Paul, 937a, Jehovah as, 166b, Jesus as, 905b, 1280a, legends, 958a, meaning, 433a
 Sayings (=Logia) of Jesus, 871-2
 Scape-goat, 289
 Scarlet thread, 347b
 Schaff on creeds, 944-6
 Schmiedel, "foundation pillars," 1016a
 Scholarship, Bible and, 41-2, 628-9, purpose of, 123b
 School, modern church, 48-9
 Schweitzer on miracles, 32b, on transfiguration, 981a
 Science, Bible and, 27b, Genesis and, 219a, N.T. criticism and, 887a, O.T. and, 122-8, religion and, 122a, theology and, 122, 123a
 Scribes, 840b, character and function, 455-7, early meaning, 402b, influence of, 10b, Jesus and, 905b, transcribers, 102a
 Scriptures (see also Bible, New Testament, Old Testament), synagogue and, 95a
 Scythian(s), 810a, invasion, 68b
 Scythopolis (=Beth-Shean), 55a
 Sea, of Galilee, 57a, Jesus walks on, 923, 979b, 1008a, 1073b, Jewish fear of, 1386b, mystery of, 506b, in Revelation, 1396a
 Seah, measure, 79b
 Sealing, a revelation, 746b, meaning in John's Revelation, 1381a
 Seals, opening of, in John's Revelation, 1379
 Seasons, Palestinian, 624b
 Sebaste, emperor's day, 1371a
 Second Coming of Christ, 991-2, 1395-8, 1046, in James, 1337a, in Revelation, 1366b, 1370a, in Paul, 1242a, 1260b, 1265b, 1268-9, 1271-2, Peter on, 1343b, 1349
 Second Esdras (=Fourth Ezra, which see)
 Second Isaiah, 178b, differences from First Isaiah, 653-4, doctrine of God in, 170b, message of, 153b, 168b
Secrets of Enoch, 199a
 Sectarianism, Paul on, 1171a
 Security, in God, 588, religious, price of, 1351b
 Seduction, laws on, 335a
 Seer, 388b, office of, 383a, prophet and, 150a
 Seir, location, 352a
 Selah, meaning, 155a, 512b
 Seleucid, Seleucidæ, Syrian kings, 71, 827b, dynasty, dates of, 112b
 Self, -confidence condemned, 681b, -consciousness of Jesus, 905-6, -control enjoined, 516b, 611b, -deception, Jesus on, 968b, -denial, Paul on, 1163, 1182-3, -denial, reward of, 984b, -emptying of Christ, 1244-5, -righteousness, 327b, 1220a, -righteousness, Jesus on, 991a, -sacrifice of Christ, 938a, -sufficiency, dangers of, 1377a, -surrender to God, 908a
 Sellin and archæology, 115b
 Semitic, animism, 165-6, element in Bible, 165a, languages, 99a, laws, 146a, origins, 103
 Semitisms in N.T., 883a
 Senir, 625a
 Sennacherib, 111a, 111b, his campaigns, 68, 118b, Hezekiah and, 118, inscription of, 634b, Judah threatened by, 435-6, and Judah, 633-6
 Separation of priests, 293a
 Septuagint (=LXX), 191a, canonicity and, 94b, 96b, importance of, 103-4, influence of, 849a, influence on Luke, 883a, Jeremiah in, 680a, and Job, 488b, and Law, 196a, MSS. of, 104a, and N.T. Greek, 882a, Philo on, 847b, 849a, rivals, 104
 Sepulchres, "whited," 990b
 Seraiah and Jeremiah, 708a
 Seraphim, 643a
 Serfdom, 428a
 Sergius Paulus, conversion of, 1110a
 Seriousness of life, in Proverbs, 609a
 Sermon, an early Christian, 1305-4, on the Mount, 198b, 960-9, Luke's report, 1037-8

- Serpent and Fall, 222b, brazen, 308b, brazen, Paul's use of, 1144b, in Eden, 177b, 203b, symbol, 972a, worship, 435a
- Servant, of Jehovah, 183, in Isaiah, 655-65, songs, 183, 639b, 655-6, suffering, 168b
- Service, brotherhood and, 909b, Jesus and, 906a, power in, 693a
- Sethos of Egypt, 635b
- Seven, churches, John greets, 1370, John's letters to, 1372-7, in creation stories, 120a, "deacons" appointed, 1102a, sacred number, 311b, 314a, 1370a
- Seventy, in apocalyptic, 189b, Jesus charges the, 1027b, mission of the, 1042-3, times seven, meaning, 1050b, weeks in Daniel, 755b, years of exile, 463
- Severity of God, Jesus on, 988a
- Sex life and home, 609b, questions, Paul on, 1177-82, Semitic attitude, 223a, vice in Proverbs, 607
- Shades of dead, 173, 500b
- Shadow of death, 500a
- Shadrach, 751a
- Shaduf, the, 328b
- Shallum, usurper, 433b
- Shalmaneser, (1) III, 110b, 111a, 631b, Ahab and, 116a, 117b, and Jehu, 117b, 432, at Karkar, 66a; (2) V, 111a, Israel and, 434b, reign of, 67b, Samaria taken by, 68a, 633
- Shamanism, 397a
- Shamash, sun-god, 523b
- Shamgar, judge, 362b
- Shammai, 964a, school of, 841b
- Sharab* (= mirage ?), 652b
- Sharezer, 436a
- Sharon, Plain of, 54a
- "Shatterer," in Nahum, 801
- Shear-jashub* ("a remnant shall return"), 434a, 637b
- Sheba, (1) queen of, 421, in Gospels, 1045a; (2) rebel, death of, 408b
- Shebat, month, 77b
- Shebna and Isaiah, 648b
- Shechaniah, 469a
- Shechem, 365b, capture, date of, 63a, covenant at, 356a, sack of, 241
- Shechemites, revolt of, 366a
- Sheep, gate, 471a, lost, parable of, 1048b
- Shekel, value, 78, weight, 79a
- Shekinah*, 272b
- Shelem* (= peace-offering), 280b
- Shem, 227a
- Shema*, the, 326a, 988b
- Shemaiah, (1) Jeremiah criticized by, 697a; (2) Nehemiah assisted by, 462a
- Sheol, 190a, 203a, 403b, 490b, 495a, 748a, in Amos, 783a, described, 212a, doctrine of, 173, horror of, 653a, in O.T., 210b, 627b, Pharaoh's descent into, 737a
- Shephelah, the, 54b, 793a
- Shepherd, allegory of, Ezekiel's, 738b, allegory of, in Peter, 1344a, faithful, 828-9, God as, 526, Jehovah as, 794a, Jesus as, 971a, 1079, songs, 155b, symbolic, 828a, unfaithful, 826a, 828a, 829a
- Sheshazzar, 112a, and exiles, 464a
- Sheshach, 707b
- Sheshonk I (= Shishak), 110b, Israel invaded by, 65a, 424b, 448b, and Palestine, 117b
- Shetha-bozenai, 466b
- Shewbread, 294b, 1003a, altar of, 418a, David and, 394a, meaning, 419b, table of, 273a
- Shibboleth, 368b
- Shiggayon* psalms, 511b
- Shigionoth*, 808b
- Shiloh, 247a, 385b, rape at, 375b, sanctuary at, 685b, tent at, 354a
- Shimei, 416a, confession of, 408a, curses David, 406b
- Shimshai, 466a
- Shinar, land of, 748b
- Ship, Tyre as a, 732
- Shishak (see Sheshonk I)
- Shoe, casting the, symbolical, 547, removal of, 348b
- Shomer* (= watchman), 150a
- Shophar* (= ram's horn), 301a
- Shophetim* (= judges), 357a
- Shrines, northern, 424a
- Shulammite, 626b
- Shunammite, Elijah and, 431b
- Shur, wilderness of, 265b
- Shushan (see also Susa), 478a
- Sibyl, function of, 197b
- Sibylline Oracles*, apocryphal book, 197b
- Siccuth, 781a
- Sick, Jesus heals the, 922, treatment of the, 1337
- Sidon, Ezekiel's oracle on, 734a, woe on, 869b
- Sign(s), Jesus and, 893a, demanded from Jesus, 976a, Jesus' distrust of, 1069b, Jesus' indifference to, 911b, Jesus refuses, 1009b, Messianic, 207b, miracles as, 921-2, of millennium, 208a
- Signature, 503a
- Signet-ring, 818b
- Sihon, defeat of, 309, 323a
- Sihor, 649a
- Silas supersedes Barnabas, 1115b
- Siloam, pool of, 471a, 841b, 1078b, described, 562b, inscription at, 99b, 101b, 118b
- Silvanus, 1266a, identity of, 1339a, 1344b
- Simeon, Anna and, 1035a, Joseph and, 245
- Simile, parable and, 914a, in Proverbs, 603
- Simon, (1) of Cyrene, 1056b, 1089a, carries Jesus' cross, 1019b; (2) the leper, 900b, Jesus and, 1082a; (3) Maccabæus, 192b, coinage of, 78; (4) the magian, 1104a
- Simpson, J. Y., on science and religion, 125b
- Sin, a barrier, 670b, bearing others', 662b, calamity for, 710, the Christian and, 1352b, after conversion, 1148-50, and the cross, 932a, and death, Paul on, 1148, and disease, 893b, excludes from God, 1353a, final defeat of, 177b, forgiveness promised, 179b, of ignorance, 281, Isaiah convicted of, 637a, Isaiah forgiven, 643a, Jerusalem's, Isaiah denounces, 648b, Jesus on, 910b, 1008b, Judah's, Jeremiah on, 683-4, and judgment, 202a, 684b, national, punishment for, 450a, offering, 170a, 274b, 284a, offering, regulations, 281, 283a, in O.T., 174b, 175a, origin of, 203, 204, 1332a, 1335b, Paul's classifications of, 1219b, 1235a, Paul's teaching on, 199b, penalty and, 1391b, personified, 823a,

- in Psalter, 542, psalm of confession, 527b, and punishment, 223a, 327a, 441a, 484, 1348b, retribution for, 765-6, a spirit, 760b, and suffering, 491a, 770a, when unpardonable, 1357-8
- Sin, Moon-god, 61a
- Sin, Wilderness of, 266a
- Sinai, 139b, 140a, arrival at, 268a, covenant at, 175a, 325, Israel and, 363a, 298-301, Jehovah and, 167a, journey to, 265-7, Sinai to Kadesh, 301-7, location, 254a, Moses and, 62a, the name, 61a
- Sinaitic Syriac N.T., 864b
- Sincerity, meaning, 1242
- Singers, Levitical, 447a
- Singing and worship, 156a
- Single eye, meaning, 967a
- Sinim, 660a
- Sinlessness of Jesus, 1077b, 1311b
- Sinners, in Gospels, 894b, Jesus' attitude to, 1076b
- Sirach, Jesus ben, author of Ecclesiasticus, 196b
- Sirocco*, meaning, 58b
- Sisera, 362b, struggle of Israel with, 63b
- Sivan, month, 77b
- Skepticism, challenged, 835, denounced, 642b, in Ecclesiastes, 616a, faith and, 565-6, in Habakkuk, 805a, in O.T., 483a, rebuked, 721b
- Slaughter, sacrificial, 329b
- Slave(s), emancipation, 330b, laws on, 270b, 335b, money value of, 762b, Paul's counsels for, 1284a, Paul on treatment of, 1292-4, Paul on slaves and masters, 1236b, perfidious treatment at Jerusalem, 699b, Peter on slaves and masters, 1342a, in Roman Empire, 1331a, Solomon's, 421a, treatment of, 983a
- Slavery, industrial, 410b, in N.T., 1260b, in O.T., 446b, 472a, 503a, Paul and, 942a, 1180b, regulations, 296a
- Slavonic Enoch, apocryphal book, 199a
- Sluggard in Proverbs, 602b
- Smalcald, Articles of, 944a
- Smith, G. A., on Isaiah, 630b
- Smith, W. R., on priestly history, 454b
- Smyrna, church of, John's letter, 1373a
- Snakes, men and, 223a
- So, Egyptian ruler, 67b, 435a, 633b
- Social, background in parables, 916b, conditions in Israel, 67a, consciousness of early church, 1100a, corruption, 797a, 832a, ethics, Jesus and, 909b, 911b, ethics, Paul on, 1233-6, gospel of prophets, 190b, justice, 794b, legislation in codes, 146b, life in Amos, 775a, life in East, 73-6, life implied in Job, 487, life, songs of, 156a, message of prophets, 151b, mind in Jonah, 789b, note in Christianity, 1351a, order and Jesus, 960a, questions at Corinth, Paul on, 1180-4, righteousness, 1330a, 1393b
- Society, the Christian, 1232-6, and Christianity, 1215b, and God, 171a, redemption of, 1398b, religious education and, 48a
- Sodom, destroyed, 232-3, Jerusalem worse than, 724a
- Sojourn, Israel's in Egypt, 252a
- Sojourner(s), meaning, 293b, 1230b
- Solar myth, Samson and, 371a
- Soldier, the Christian, 1286
- Solidarity, 394b, family, 405, of mankind, 441b
- Solomon, accession of, 416, adversaries, three, 422, the builder, 417, career of, 148a, chooses wisdom, 417a, chronology of his reign, 109-110, dedicatory hymn, 157a, exploits of, 64b, foreign princesses and, 421b, importance of reign, 422-3, marries Egyptian, 416b, and Proverbs, 171b, 604, his thousand proverbs, 156b, quarries of, 53a, in Song of Songs, 624-5, story of, 415-23, 446-48, Temple of, 417-20, wealth of, 421b
- Solomon, Wisdom of*, apocryphal book, 197a
- Son, of David, 182a, 210a, Jesus as, 1014a, of God, Christ as, 937b, 1300, Jesus as, 891b, 998b, 1004a, 1068a, of God, Messianic title, 181b, 980a, of God, in Paul, 1138a, of God, in Psalms, 516a, of man, 185, 887a, of man, apocalyptic, 846a, 847a, of man, his coming, 1015b, of man, in Daniel, 754a, of man, in Gospels, 977b, 1051a, of man, Jesus on, 972a, 1002a, of man, John's vision, 1371, of man, meaning, 970a, of man, in Revelation, 1390a
- Song(s), collections of, 156b, 157a, Deborah's, 362-3, of deliverance, Moses', 265, of Israel, 142b, of labor in O.T., 155b, in Luke, 883a, of Moses, 340-2, new, in Revelation, 1378b, of O.T., 155-6, 510a, of social life, 156a, of Songs, character, 157a, of Songs, canon and, 96b, of Songs, parallels, 120a, of the sword, Ezekiel's, 727b
- Sons, of God, Christians as, 1153-4, of the prophets, 152b
- Sonship, of Christ in fourth Gospel, 1073a, Christian, 1355b, conditions of, 962a, of Jesus, 905b, 1093a, faith and, 1215, man's to God, 908a
- Sopheh* (=spy), 150a
- Sopherim* (=scribes), 102b, 455b
- Sorcerers denounced, 722
- Sorek, Valley of, 56a
- Sosthenes, Paul and, 1120b
- Soul, 202b, meaning, 165a, in O.T., 623b, 717b, 725b, 737b
- Sources, for Ezra-Nehemiah, 463, for Genesis, 217b, for Gospels, 870a, 872, 953-6, for Jesus' teaching, 904a, for O.T. history, 147b, 381, 413
- South, the (=Negeb), 360b, Galatia, Paul in, 939-40
- Southern Kingdom (see Judah)
- Sovereignty of God, 162a, 785b, 799a, 826b, 1155-6
- Sower, parable of, 916b, 917a, 976-7, 1040a
- Sowing and reaping, 1220b
- Spain, Paul and, 878b, 1166a, 1275b
- Span, measurement, 79
- Spanheim on Pentateuch, 137b
- Sparrow, Jesus' use of, 1045b
- Spies, Danite, 373, of Moses, 322b, their report, 303-4
- Spikenard, 624a, 1016b, 1082a
- Spinoza, 136b, and religion, 171b
- Spirit, action of the, 364a, as "breath" of God, 740b, of Christ and criticism, 890b, and Christ, Paul on, 1197b, 1243a, descent of, 447b, and the disciples, 1086a, Divine,

- Hebrew idea of, 999a, dove and, 892b, evil, 391b, God as, 164a, 716b, of God, 220a, of God in man, 168b, 388b, of God and myth, 125b, of God in O.T., 9a, 275b, Holy, in O.T. and N.T., 176a, of Jesus, 36b, and Jesus, 1086a, in Joel, 769a, of man, 202b, and Messiah, 182b, in Paul, 938b, at Pentecost, 928b, life in the, Paul on, 1152-3, 1227a, outpouring of, 180b, 772b, possession, 1235b, the world and the, 1086a, and worship, 179a
- Spiritism, 397a, denounced, 644b
- Spirits, and God, 428b, in O.T., 158b
- Spiritual, decline, 67a, forces, supremacy of, 1367a, gifts, Paul on, 1186-90, man, Paul on, 1175b, marriage, 1181, religion, in Jeremiah, 679a, sacrifices, 676a
- Spirituality, 180b, of God, 160b, 162a
- "Spiritualizing" Scripture, 4a
- Spittle, curative, 1009b, Jesus' use of, 925a
- Spoils of war, 314-5
- Spirits* (=basket), 1009b
- Squadrons, in Revelation, 1383a
- Staerk on the Psalter, 514a
- Staff, of life, 296b, shepherd's, 829a
- Star, in the East, 874b, 891a, Messiah as "Star," 193a
- Stars, personal beings, 363a, Hebrews and, 127b
- State, and Christians, in Paul, 1161
- Statistics in Bible, 25b
- Stature, 967a
- Statutes, the, meaning, 324b, 329a
- Stephanas, 1171b, Paul and, 1194b
- Stephen, arrest and death, 877a, 1102-3, Paul and, 935b, and prophecy, 181b
- Steward(s), fidelity of, 1176b, unjust, parable of, 1029b, 1049
- Stewardship, the teacher's, 1279b
- Sticks, Ezekiel's symbol of, 740b
- Stocks, Jeremiah in the, 691b
- Stoicism, 196a, character of, 850b
- Stone(s), sacred, 346b, 356b, memorial, 348, worship, 165b, 166a
- Stoning, method, 350a, of Paul, 1112b
- Storehouse, God's, 835b
- Stories, apocalyptic and, 192a, apocrypha and, 195-6, in Bible, characteristics, 21b
- Storm, Jesus stills the, 869a, 896a
- Straightforwardness, 608a
- Strange fire, 285a
- Stranger(s), 293b, 306b, 377b, kindness to, 1360b, legislation on, 270b, meaning in O.T., 722b
- Streeter, on beloved disciple, 1064b, on dates in life of Jesus, 874, on four-document hypothesis, 872b, on Gospel sources, 954b, on John the Elder, 1065a, on John's use of Luke, 1062a, on Luke's "long omission," 871b, on N.T. Greek manuscripts, 861b
- Strife in church rebuked, 1335-6
- Stubbornness, Jonah's, 787-90
- Study of Scripture, method, 3-14, 629a
- Stumblingblock, the cross as, 932a
- Subjection to Law, 1215
- Submission, enjoined, 505a, to God, 712a, Job's, 507-8
- Substitution, 170a, 663
- Suburbs, meaning in Joshua, 355a
- Success, in Proverbs, 611a
- Succoth, 263a, 365a
- Sufferer, prayer of, 535
- Suffering, of Christ, priestly, 1367, and Ecclesiastes, 172a, Jesus predicts his, 1010-3, and glory, 1154a, and God, 202a, from God, 711a, God addresses Job on, 505-7, Job and, 7a, 8b, 172a, 497b, and justice, 174a, meaning of, 1322-3, prayer for deliverance from, 517b, problem of, 483-4, 1030b, problem of, in Peter, 1338a, redemptive, 489b, results of, 1340b, retributive, 498b, of righteous, 554b, sanctification of, 759a, Servant, 133a, 168b, 183, 655-65, 847a, Servant, Jesus as, 906, and sin, 491a, for sin, 712b, undeserved, 552b
- Sumerian, language, 114a, flood story, origin of, 121a
- Summum bonum*, 614b
- Sun, images, 647b, 718b, myth, 369a, standing still, 351b, worship, 503a, 719b
- Supernatural in apocalypses, 843-4
- Superscription on cross, 181b
- Superstition in Paul's day, 11b
- Supper, parable of the, 1047b
- Survival of death, religion and, 173a
- Susa (see also Shushan), 461a, 469b, 482, Persian palace, 478a
- Susanna*, Book of, apocryphal, 194a
- Swearing rashly, 282a
- Swete's edition of LXX, 104a
- Swine, Jesus and, 1006b, unclean, 74b, 286a
- Sword, of Jehovah, 727b, Jesus sends a, 972b, symbol of authority, 1373b
- Sycamore fig, in Amos, 782b
- Sychar, well at, 1071a
- Symbolic, actions, 428b, Ezekiel's, 721b, 740b, Isaiah's, 648a, Micah's, 792b, prophetic, 822a, eating, 1184a, names, in Hosea, 760a
- Symbolism, 201b, in apocalyptic, 189a, 844a, in fourth Gospel, 857b, in Mark, 997a, of miracle, 926b, in O.T., 708a, 829a, prophetic, 714a, in Revelation, 858a, of serpent, 177b, of tabernacle furniture, 1314b, in Temple, 418-9
- Symbols, in apocalyptic, 1367b, of the N.T. manuscripts, 860a, and religion, 179a
- Symmachus, 134a, Greek O.T. of, 104b
- Sympathy of Christ, 1306b
- Synagogue(s), function of, 74a, Great, 130b, importance of, 849a, origin of, 556b, rivals of Temple, 445b, and Scripture, 95a, at Tell-Hum, 1038b
- Syncretism, religious, 1250b
- Synoptic Gospels, 867-73, compared with fourth Gospel, 1060, problem of, 888a, teaching of Jesus and, 904a
- Syria, dates for O.T. study, 112, David overcomes, 402b, Israel and, 148a, Judah and, 71, kings of, in Daniel, 757b, Samaria besieged by, 431
- Syriac, Apocalypse of Baruch, 199a, Curetonian N.T., 865a, Peshitta N.T., 865a, Sinaitic N.T., 864b, N.T. manuscripts, 861b, versions of N.T., 864-5
- Syro-Ephraimite war, 434

Syro-Phoenicia, Jesus in, 897b, Jesus heals daughter of woman in, 925b, 1009a
Syrtes Major, 1132a

T

- Ta'anach, 55b, excavations at, 114b
 Tabeal, 643b
 Taberah, destruction at, 302a
 Tabernacle, 279a, dimensions of, 273a, in wilderness, 272-3, 1314
 Tabernacles (= Booths), Feast of, 270b, 331b, 831b, celebrated, 473b
 Tabitha, Peter restores, 1106
 Table-serving in Acts, 1102
 Table-talk, Jesus', 1029b, 1047b
 Tables, of law, renewed, 277, of stone (law?), 272a
 Tablet of Gezer, 99b
 Taboo, 285b, 288b, 390b, in Bible lands, 74b, and holiness, 170a, 283a, and religion, 174b
 Tadmor (= Palmyra), 448a
 Tahpanhes (see Tephaphnehes), 703b
Taleitha coum, 882b
 Talent(s), value, 78, weight, 79a, parable of, 992a
 Tales of Israel, 217b
 Talmud, Babylonian, 135a, on O.T. authors, 130b, origin, 456a, and Zadokites, 193a
 Tamar, Ammon and, 404, Judah and, 243b
 Tammuz, 77b, 368a, 830a, worship of, 719b
 Tares, parable of, 917b, 977b
 Targum, 106b, of Onkelos, 103a
 Tarshish, (1) the gem, 626a; (2) Jonah at, 787b; (3) in Spain, 687b
 Tarsus, 934b, Paul at, 939b
 Tartarus, 212b
 Tassels, 305a
 Tatian, his Diatessaron (harmony of Gospels), 864b
 Tattenai, 466b
 Taunt songs of O.T., 155b
 Tax, Jesus and, 981b, sanctuary or Temple, 275a, Roman taxes, 1002b
 Teacher, the Christian and his N.T., 890b, false, condemned, 686b, ill-prepared, 1335a, Isaiah as, 638a, in Israel, 449b, Jesus as, 904-5, 1000-1, stewardship of, 1279b
 Teaching, Christian, history of, 46-7, in Church, 1276-7, of Jesus, 36, 904a, of O.T., 382b, parabolic, Jesus', 977a, of prophets, 151-2, by Scribes, 456
Te' asshur tree (see Boxwood)
 Tebeth, month, 77b
 Tephaphnehes (= Daphnæ; see Tahpanhes), 735b
Tephillah (= praises), 509a
Tehôm (= abyss), 120a
 Tekoa, 777a
 Tel-abib, Ezekiel at, 714a, meaning of name, 717b
 Tel-el-Amarna, 166b, letters (tablets), 52b, 100b, 109a, 115b, 117a, 251b, letters, contents of, 116b, letters, value of, 63a
 Tell-Hum, synagogue at, 1038b
 Tells, 54a
 Teman, 778a
 Tempest, Jesus stills, 923, 970, 1006a, 1040a
 Temple (the five Temples: Wilderness Tabernacle, Solomon's, Ezekiel's, Zerubbabel's, Herod's, 417b), Antiochus pollutes, 71b, arrangements, 418a, building and dedication, 414a, 446-8, Christianity and, 446, Chronicler's conception of, 451b, date of Solomon's, 251a, David and, 401-2, 443b, 444, dimensions, 418a, of Egyptian Jews, 119a, Ezekiel's ideal, 742-3, final destruction of, 71b, furnishings of, 418-9, 446-7, Herod's, 418b, Herod's, and Jesus' ministry, 875a, Isaiah in, 636b, Jeremiah on, 678b, 685b, 692b, 694a, 696a, Jesus and, 36a, 840b, Jesus cleanses, 900a, 986a, 1069a, Judaism and, 839, measurement of, in Revelation, 1384a, in millennium, 208a, post-exilic, 184a, profanation of, 192b, 710b, and Psalter, 170, ritual, 169-70, Solomon's, 417-20, Solomon's dedicated, 447-8, tax, 981b, in Zechariah, 820a, of Zerubbabel (and Haggai), 70b, 112a, 459b, 465-6, 674a, 815-6
 Temptation(s), deliverance from, 966b, of Jesus, 12b, 892-3, 959-60, 999b, 1036a, 1303b, kinds of, 1331a, process of, 222b, source of, 1332a
 Ten Commandments, the, 268-9, 325, Moses and, 145b
 "Tendency" in biblical books, 32
 Tent, of meeting, 272, 277a, 279a, at Shiloh, 354a, and Temple, 402a
Tephillin (= phylacteries), 1381a, 1387b
Tephilloth (= prayers), 509a
 Terah of Ur, 61a, 228b, migration of, 108b
 Teraphim, 239b, 372b, 391a, 762b, 827b
 Terebinth, 672a, meaning, 265b, soothsayer's, 366a
 Tertius, Paul's amanuensis, 1167b
 Tertullian and creed, 948a
 Tertullus, Paul and, 1129a
 Testament (= covenant), in Christ, 1316, meaning, 853a
Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, apocryphal book, 198, teachings of, 206a, 207a, 208a, 209b, 211a
Testimonies against the Jews, early Christian document, 1059, 1165a
 Testimony, the, meaning, 266b
 Testing, Job's, 490a
 Tetrastich, poetic, 155a
 Textual criticism, 105-7, 129-30, 888-9, variations, 101-2
Textus Receptus, 860-1
 Thaddæus (= Lebbæus), 1037
 Thank-offerings, 280b
 Thanksgiving, call to, 578, for deliverance, 587-8, God desires, 536a, for forgiveness, 531b, Hezekiah's song of, 652b, hymn, 410a, 523a, national, 549-50, Paul on, 1252, for recovery, 530b, 537a, song of, 573-4
 Thebes (= No-Amon), 802b
 Theism of O.T., 158-64
 Theocracy, 387, a future, 207b, and Jews, 932b
 Theodore of Mopsuestia, 622a
 Theodotion, Greek O.T. of, 104b
 Theology, authority of, 948a, in early church, 947b, and ethics, 1202a, and ethics, in Colossians, 1250a, and ethics, in Ephesians, 1222, and experience, in Paul, 1253-7, and

- life, 1301b, in N.T., 949b, of Pentateuch, 139b, 140-1, of Psalter, 170b, and science, 122, 123a
 Theophany, 166a, 230b, 232a, 343a, 674-5, 684a, to Elijah, 427a, to Ezekiel, 716, to John, 1377-9, at Sinai, 268-9, to Solomon, 420b, 446a
 Theophilus, character of, 1022a
 Thermouthis, Moses and, 253b
 Thessalonica, city and church, 1263, Paul at, 1118
 Thigh, sacred, 284b
 Third, heaven, 212b, 1205a, Isaiah, 668, Isaiah, message of, 153b, Maccabees. Book of, 192b
 Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, 945b
 Thomas, disciple, 1080b, Jesus' appearance to, 1090b
 Thorn(s), 667b, in the flesh, Paul's, 1205b, 1217b
 Thothmes III, 116a, 251a, in Palestine, 60a
 Thousand, symbolical number, 1395a, years, and God's Kingdom, 208b
 Thracians, Herodotus on, 619a
Three Children, Song of, apocryphal book, 194a
 Throne in heaven, 1377b
 Thummim (see also Urim), 274a, 284a, 313b, 390a, 464b
 Thunder, Jehovah and, 268b, voice of God, 530a
 Thutmose III, 109a
 Thyatira, church at, John's letter, 1374
Tāmat (=abyss, chaos), 120a, 220a, 492a, 661a, 783a
 Tiberian scribes, 102b, 103a
 Tiberias, Sea of, 57a
 Tiberius, reign of, 875a
 Tidal, Abram and, 230a
 Tiglath-pileser, (1) I, 366b, 631b, his boast, 736b; (2) III, 110b, 111a, 434a, Ahaz and, 434b, aims of, 632a, Israel and, 67b, 118a, 434b, 633a, Isaiah and, 638a
 Timbrel, 265b, 561a
 Time, in Bible, 77
 Timnah, 369a
 Timothy, and Corinth, 1194b, and Corinthians, 1169a, epistles, their message, 855a, 942, life and work, 1279a, Paul and, 940b, 1116a, 1268a, Paul's commission to, 1276-7
 Tirhakah of Egypt, 118b, 436a, 635b
 Tirshatha, 464b
 Tirzah, 626b
 Tischendorf and s, 862b, and the Greek N.T., 861a, his manuscripts, 86a
 Tishri (=Ethnanim), month, 77b, 465a
 Tithes, 297, 306b, demanded, 835b, law of, 474b, regulations, 330b, ritual of, 338a
 Tithing, Jesus on, 990
 Titles of psalms explained—mizmōr, miktām, maskil, etc., 511-2
 Titus, (1) the elder, Corinth and, 1201-2, Corinthians and, 1169a, epistle, and message of, 855a, 942, Paul and, 1210-1, Paul's commission to, 1276-7, 1288-9; (2) Roman general, destroys Jerusalem, 71b
 Tobiah, Nehemiah and, 461b, 470b, 475b
 Tobias, in Book of Tobit, 195a
Tobit, Book of, apocryphal, 195a
 Togarmah, 732b
 Tola, judge, 366b
 Tolerance, Christian, 1114, 1211, Jesus and, 1012b, 1042b, Paul on, 1162
 Tombs, arrangement of, 994a
 Tongue(s), James on the, 1335a, at Pentecost, 928b, Paul on the gift of, 1188-90, speaking with, 1097
 Topheth, 691b, Jeremiah on, 686a
Torah (=Law, which see), 841a, fence of, 456b, meaning, 134a, 146b
 Torrey, on Acts, 1095a, on language of Acts, 880a, on language of Luke, 883a
 Totemism, 166a
 Touch, healing by, 923a, 924b, 1007a
 Tower(s), Babylonian, 228a, Habakkuk's, 806
 Trade, guilds at Thyatira, 1374a, routes, 55a, routes and Palestine, 52b
 Tradition, apostolic, authority of, 947b, Christian, authority of, 1347b, 1349b, 1362a, in Genesis, 217b, and Gospels, 867a, 871a, of Hebrew people, 142b, 143a, and Jesus, 905a, Jewish oral, 932b, Mishna (=tradition), beginnings of, 456a, and O.T., 358, 382, 439b, oral, 91b, 92a, and religion, 379-80, Roman and Greek Catholics on, 946
 Traditionalism revised, 486b
 Training, and evil, 483b, for service, 1277a
 Transcendence, in apocalyptic, 844-5, of God, 163b, 164a, 716b
 Transfer of uncleanness, 287b
 Transfiguration, Jesus', 898b, 981a, 1011, 1027b, 1041b
 Trans-Jordania, described, 57-8
 Translation of the saints, 429b
 Translations, English Bible, 80-7, modern, 5a
 Transmission, of Gospel, 871a, of O.T., 99-107, oral, 100b
 Transubstantiation, 944a
 Treasure, guarding the, 1375b, parable of hidden, 917b, 978a
 Tree(s), Ezekiel's allegory of, 735-6, of knowledge, 222b, of life, 223b, of life in Revelation, 1372b, Nebuchadrezzar's dream, 751b, sacred, 346b, sparing the, 334a, worship, 166a, 641a
 Tregelles and Greek N.T., 861a
 Trent, Council of, 191a, 946a
 Trespass (=debt), 966a, offering, 170a
 Trial, the good man's, 489a, of Jesus, 902, and perfecting of life, 1331a, results of, 1340b
 Tribes, boundaries of, 316b, in Egypt, 117a, northern, campaign of, 361a, territories of, 354
 Tribulation, in apocalyptic, 1015b, Messianic, 207b, purified by, 1381a, uses of, 1146b
 Tribute money, 79a, Jesus on, 988a
 Trigon (=harp), 750b
 Trinity, in Erasmus' N.T., 861a, in John, 1357b, in Revelation, 1379a, the Spirit and, 1086a
 Tristich, poetic, 155a
 Triumph song, in Revelation, 1393-4
 Triumphal entry, 899b, 985-6, 1014a, 1053a, 1082b
 Troas, Paul at, 1124a, Paul's call to Macedonia, 1116b
 Troelstra on Pentateuch, 137b

- Trumpet(s), 268b, Festival of, 294b, silver, 301a, sounding of the seven, 1381-3
- Trust in God, 517a, 521b, 528, 908a, Jesus on, 966-7
- Trustworthiness, of Bible, 26-7, 107, of God, 620b
- Truthfulness, Jesus on, 964a
- Tubal, 732b
- Tuch, F., on Pentateuch, 136b
- Tunstall and English Bible, 83a
- Turner on dates of Jesus, 874, of Paul, 878
- Turtle-dove, 624b, offering of, 279b, 282a
- Tutor, the Law as, 1215, in Paul, 1177a
- Twelve, the, (1) disciples, chosen, 895b, 970-3, 1004, 1037, sent forth, 896b, 1007b, missionary tours of, 1040b; (2) tribes, 299a, origin, 238b
- Two-document hypothesis of Gospels, 872b
- Tyndale, translator, 82-3
- Tyndall on creation narrative, 128a
- Tyre, Amos' judgment on, 777b, in Ezekiel, history of, 731-4, Isaiah's oracle on, 649a, Israel and, 66a, 425b, siege of, 649a, woe on, 869b
- U
- Uncertainties of life, 619b
- Uncial MSS. of N.T., 860a, 862-3
- Unclean spirit, 1000b
- Uncleanness, ceremonial, 285b, laws on, 285-8
- Understanding and life, 607b
- Unforgiving servant, parable of, 916a
- Unfruitfulness, Jesus on, 968
- Unholiness, ritual, 818a
- Union with Christ, 1149
- Uniqueness of Christ, 929
- United Monarchy (see also Israel, Judah), 64
- Unity, of Bible, 39b, brotherly, extolled, 592b, of church, 938b, Christian, 1222b, 1227a, 1244a, Jesus prays for, 1087, of God, 160a, of Israel, 159a, 380b, of mankind in Christ, 1229-33, of O.T. and N.T., 175-6
- Universalism, in apocalyptic, 202a, of God, 658a, of Gospel, 1251b, 1396b, 1397a, of Jesus, 933a, 971a, 1026a, legalistic, 826a, of Obadiah, 786b, of O.T., 180a, 181a, of prophets, 185b, 770b, in Psalter, 564b, 571a
- Universe, O.T. conception of, 124-5
- Unkindness, 491b
- Unleavened Bread, Feast of, 262b, 263b, 270a
- Unpardonable sin, 1005a, 1357-8
- Unrighteousness of man, 491a, 515a
- Untimely death, 619a
- Ur, of Chaldees, 61a
- Uriah, David and, 403
- Uriel, function of, 205a
- Urim (see also Thummim), 274a, 284a, 313b, 390a, 464b
- Ur-Markus, 870a
- Urusalim (= Jerusalem), 116b, 374b
- Usher's chronology, 126a
- Usury condemned, 472a, forbidden, 296a
- Utilitarianism, in Deuteronomy, 320b, in religion, 835b
- Ut-napishtim, 120b
- Uz, land of, 490a
- Uzzah and ark, 6b, 401a
- Uzziah, king of Judah, 632b, reign of, 433b, 451a
- Valley, gate, 471a, dry bones, Ezekiel's vision, 740
- Value, of O.T. history, 132a, standards of, 78
- Values, religious and teaching, in Amos, 776b, in Corinthians, 1170, in Exodus, 250, in fourth Gospel, 1092, in Habakkuk, 804-5, in Joel, 770b, in Jonah, 788-9, in Micah, 791-2, in Nahum, 799, in Obadiah, 785, of O.T., 278b, 359-60, 747b, in Psalter, 514, in Zechariah, 819-20, 826, in Zephaniah, 810b
- Vanity, vanities, 503a, in Ecclesiastes, 615b, gods as, 690a
- Variations in Hebrew Bible, 103, in Gospels, 953-4, in O.T. text, 101-2
- Vashti, queen, and Ahasuerus, 478
- Veil of tabernacle, 289a, of Temple, 446b, of Temple, rent, 1058a
- Veiling of women, Paul on, 1184-5
- Vellum MSS., 862a
- Vengeance, 395b, of Gibeonites, 409b, of Jehovah, 673, 800, prayer for, 712a
- Veracity, 611b
- Verbal inspiration, 27b, 41a, 129-30, 857a, and Gospel differences, 869b, 870b
- Verily, meaning, 963a
- Versions of Bible, 86-7, 860a, of N.T., necessity of, 864-5, of O.T., 103-5
- Vespasian in John's Revelation, 1368a
- Vicarious suffering, 663
- Victory songs of O.T., 155b
- Village life in Palestine, 74a
- Vincent of Lerins, rule of, 949a
- Vindication in Job, 502b
- Vindictiveness in O.T., 836, in Psalter, 517b
- Vine, allegory in Ezekiel, 724b, 726a, and branches, Jesus' allegory, 1085, metaphor of Israel, 560b, 684a, 723a
- Vineyard, Isaiah's parable of, 642a, Jesus' parable of laborers in, 985
- Vintage song, 155b
- Viper, Paul bitten, 927a, 1133a
- Virgin birth of Jesus, 891-2, 957, 1007b, 1025-6, 1067b, in Isaiah, 183a, 643b
- Virginity, 335
- Virgin's Spring, 118b, 774a
- Virgins, wise and foolish, parable, 991b
- Virtues, Christian, Peter's classification of, 1343b, Paul's classifications of, 1219b, 1248, in Proverbs, 611b
- Vision, apocalyptic and, 189b, of God, 447b, 522a, Isaiah's, 636b, 643a, John's, of angel with book, 1383-4, John's, of beasts, 1386-8, John's, of bowls, 1390-1, John's, of church triumphant, 1388a, John's, of doom of Rome, 1392-3, John's, of final kingdom, 1396-8, John's, of the great Harlot, 1391-2, John's, of judgment on nations, 1390a, John's, of Last Judgment, 1395-6, John's, of the martyrs, 1395a, John's, of redemptive love, 1377-9, John's, of Son of man, 1371, John's, of the triumphant host, 1380-1, John's, of warrior on white horse, 1394a, John's, of woman clothed with sun, 1385-6, Joshua's, 348b, Peter's and Cornelius', 1106b
- Visions, Amos', of judgment, 781-2, apocalyptic, 153b, in Bible, 24b, 25a, in Daniel, 746b,

- 753-8, Ezekiel's, 715b, 716a, 719b, 720, 735b, 740, 742, prophetic, 151b, 1367a, in Zechariah, 819b, 820-3
- Visit, visitation, divine, meaning of, 492a
- Vitringa on Pentateuch, 137b
- Vizier, Haman's office, 479a
- Voice of God, 720b, of Jehovah, 529b
- Von Soden on dates of Jesus, 874
- Vow(s), 306b, 336a, commutation of, 297, fulfillment of, 542b, 549b, 550, 558a, Jephthah's, 367b, Nazirite, 300, rash, 618b, responsibilities for, 314
- Vowels, Hebrew, 100a
- Vulgate, origin of, 105a, 865b
- W
- W, Washington Codex, 860b, contents, 862b, 863a
- Wadi(s), meaning, 327b, el-Arish, 54b; Wadis of Judaea: Brook Kidron, Son of Hinnom, Valley of Jehoshaphat, 56a, el-Afrang, 56b, Arabah, 57b; Wadis of Samaria: Farah, Deir Balaat, Qelt, es-Sweinit, 55b, Ruwabi, 56a; Wadis of Trans-Jordania: Heshban, Jabbok, Zerka Ma'in, el-Mojib, el-Kerak, 58
- Wages, 336b
- Wall, symbolism of a, 821b
- Wallet, disciples', 971b
- Wanderings of Israel, 62b, 263-4, 298-301, 301-7, 307-17, 322a
- Want, Proverbs on, 602b
- War, in Chronicles, 440b, destruction of, promised, 178b, 641b, 795, Wars of Jehovah, Book of, 91b, 100b, 157a, justification of, 449a, laws of, 333-4, and Messiah, 184b, in Proverbs, 613a, sanctification of, 773b, spoils of, 314-5
- Warfare, the Christian, 1236-7
- Warrior on white horse, 1394a
- Washing of hands, Jesus on, 897a
- "Wasters," in Nahum, 801
- Watch, period of time, 77a
- Watchfulness, enjoined, 1375a, 1391a, necessity of, 1351b, parables of, 917b
- Watchman, duty of, 672b, 737b, prophet as, 717b
- Water, gate, 471a, Jesus walks on, 869a, of life, 539d, of life, Jesus as, 1076, Moses supplies, 307
- Waving of offerings, 283b
- "Way, The," in Acts, 1094a, 1098a, of righteous and unrighteous, 515
- We-sections of Acts, 1022b, 1095a
- Wealth, happiness and, 617-9, Jesus on, 910a, worship of, 1393b
- Wedding festivities, 626b, guests, parable of, 987b, procession, 624b, song, 155b, 622
- Week-day religious education, 50b
- Weeks, in apocalyptic, 189b, Feast of, 270b, 294, 331b, seventy, in Daniel, 755b
- Weights, in Bible, 79a, just, 292a
- Welch, on archaeology, 115b, on Deuteronomy, 321a
- Wellhausen (see also Graf-Wellhausen), 115b, on O.T. canon, 97b
- Well-song, 155b
- Wendland on miracles, 921a, 928a
- Wesley on half-awakened sinners, 1308a
- Westcott, on Epistle to Hebrews, 1299b, on fourth Gospel, 1060b, 1063a, and Hort, Greek N.T., 861
- Western, MSS. of N.T., 861b, Greek text of N.T., 861a
- Western Sea (= Mediterranean), 772a
- Westminster Confession, on Bible, 945b
- Wheel, Ezekiel's vision, 716
- Whirlwind, symbolic, 429b
- White garments, symbolism of, 1375b, 1377a, 1381a, 1395b, horse and rider, 1379b
- Wicked, destiny of, 495b, 836, lot of, 497a, prosperity of, 498, 554b, ruin of, 501a
- Wickedness, folly of, 619a, God's apparent indifference to, 500a, personified, 823a, punished, 483b, 1362b
- Widows, care of, in N.T., 1283b, legislation, 270b
- Wiener on Pentateuch, 137b
- Wife, infidelity of, 300a
- Wild beasts and Messianic age, 178b
- Wildeboer, on Book of the Law, 93a, on date of prophetic canon, 95a, on "Writings," 95a
- Wilderness, 322a
- Winckler on Pentateuch, 137b
- Wind, feeding on, 617a
- Wine, drinking, 807b, Rechabites and, 699b
- Winepress, metaphor of, 1394
- Winnowing fan, 959a
- Wisdom, apocalyptic and, 192a, apocrypha and, 196-7, Christ and "Wisdom," 1253b, Christ, wisdom of God, 937b, 1172b, Christian, 972a, defined, 603a, 607b, in Ecclesiasticus, 197a, in Ecclesiastes, 614b, and folly, 615a, of God, 201b, of God, in Job, 501, as God's gift, 413b, James on the true, 1331b, Jesus and, 974a, 992a, and knowledge, 607b, meanings of, 488a, 614b, Mistress, in Proverbs, 603-4, personified, 157b, 845a, and pleasure, 617a, praise of, 620, in Proverbs, 171b, psalm, 534b, in Psalter, 548a, 558-9, quest for, 616b, Solomon's, 423, Solomon's choice of, 417a, worth of, 606b, 619a
- Wisdom Literature, 16b, 157b, conception of God in, 163-4, and ethics, 171-2, and James' epistle, 1329b, of O.T., 154-7, parallels to, 120a, Book of Wisdom of Solomon, 171b, 197a, idea of God in, 202b
- Wise Men, 9a, 16b, 156b, 616b, conception of God, 454a, and Jesus, 958a, significance of, 171b
- Witch of Endor, 396-7
- Withered hand, Jesus heals, 869a, 1003b
- "Witness, The," in fourth Gospel, 1064-6, witness in heaven, Job's, 496a, 497b, witness, meaning of, 1102b, of the Spirit, 1357b
- Witnesses, John's prophecy of the two, 1384b, law of, 333b
- Witsius on Pentateuch, 137b
- Wives, foreign, ordered put away, 469
- Woes, as signs, 207b, Isaiah's six, 642, Jesus', on Pharisees, 989-91, in Revelation, 1379-80
- Wo-man (= woman), 222a
- Woman, Women, Christianity and, 1342b, in church, 1280b, clothed with sun, John's vision, 1385-6, equality of, 610b, fashionable, 779b, Isaiah's appeal to, 651b, Isaiah

- denounces, 641b, with issue of blood, 896b,
Jesus and, 896a, 1040a, in Luke, 1035a, in Proverbs, 605, rights of, 320a, status of,
1325b, 335a, subordinate, 478b
Woolman, John, on slavery, 410b
Word, "become flesh," 1066-7, creative "word" of Jehovah, 532a, word of God, doing the,
1332-3, word of God, its power, 667b,
Word of God in Revelation, 1394b, word
personified, 424b
Words, from the Cross, seven, 1057a, "words" or laws, 146a
Wordsworth and Job, 485a
Work and happiness, 617-9
Workman, the Christian, 1286-7
Works and faith in James, 1330a, 1334
World, church and, 789-90, -court, 795b, end of, 189b, greatness and glory of, 485a,
in Hebrew thought, 123b, in fourth Gospel,
1067a, hatred of, 1085b, -judgment, 649-50,
773b, -order, in Job, 499b, -powers, in Colossians, 1252, -powers, of darkness, 1383a, -rulers, 1174b, 1231b, -rulers, final clash of, 1236-7, -view, Hebrew, 500b
Wormwood, 780b
Worship, and codes, 270a, centralized in Jerusalem, 146a, in Chronicles, 440b, of emperor, 11b, for God alone, 1389a, of God, universal,
831b, in heaven, 1377-8, Josiah centralizes,
677b, laws of, 329-31, motives of, 572b, N.T.
and, 858b, public, 816a, purity of, 321a, and singing, 156a, in spirit, 179a, symbolic acts, 528a, and tabernacle of wilderness, 1315a,
true, described, 521
Wrath, cup of divine, 661b, day of, 800b, of God, 811-13, 1229a, of God, in Revelation,
1390-1, of God, and righteousness, 1139-40
Written, prophecy, 152, records and Christianity, 45-6
Writers, of O.T., 101a, of O.T., purpose, 132
Writing(s), hazards of, 101, Hebrew, 99-100, methods of O.T., 485-7, Moses and, 100b, 115, 267a, tablets, 863b; the "Writings," canonization of, 95-7, contents of, 95a
Wyclif, life and work, 80-1
Wycliffite Bible, 81b
- X
- Xerxes (see also Ahasuerus), 477a, Xerxes I,
the Persian, 460a, Alexander and, 757b, at Salamis, 479a
Ximenes, Cardinal, 103a, Greek Bible of, 860b
- Y
- Yah (= Jehovah), 551a
Yahweh (= Jehovah), 62a, 218a, etymology of, 256
Yarmuk, river, 58a
Year, lunar and solar, 77b
Yeter (= inclination), 204a
Yithron (= profit), in Proverbs, 614b
Yoke, -bearing, 975a, -fellow, Paul's, 1238b, measurement, 79b, of religion, 684a, symbol,
in Jeremiah, 695b
Youth and book of Proverbs, 602a, 609-13, remembering God in, 620-1
Ysiraa (= Israel), 251a
- Z
- Zacchæus, Jesus and, 899b, 1031a, 1052a
Zachariah, 991a
Zacharias, promised a son, 1033b
Zadok, 385a, 416a, and priesthood, 170a
Zadokite, 715b, Zadokite Fragments, apocryphal book, 193a
Zalmon, Mount, 366b
Zalmunna, 365a
Zamzumim, 323a
Zealot, 842a, 1004b, 1037b
Zebah, 365a
Zebedee, sons of, called, 1036b, their ambition,
993a, 1013
Zebul, 366a
Zebulon, Moses' blessing, 344a
Zechariah, (1) king, 433, assassination of, 450b;
(2) prophet, Messiah and, 184, 185b, message, 153b, and post-exilic life, 169a, and Temple, 460a, 466b
Zedekiah, blinded, 721b, the name, 183b,
Jeremiah and, 692a, 701, rebellion and overthrow, 708, reign of, 69b, 452b
Zeeb, 365a
Zelophehad, daughters of, 313, 317b
Zephaniah, Josiah and, 810a, message, 153a
Zephathah, valley of, 56b
Zerah, defeat of, 449a
Zered, wadi, 309a
Zerubbabel, 70b, 464a, 815-8, 819a, 822b,
823b, as Messiah, 184a
Ziba and David, 406a
Zidon, 352a
Ziklag and David, 397b
Zimmim, 733a
Zimri, reign of, 425b
Zin, location, 304a
Zion (= David's City), excavations at, 117a, meaning of name, 420a, 557b, and Messianic age, 180a, restored, 671b
Zipporah, 254a
Ziv (= Iyyar), month, 77b
Ziz (= abundance), 676a
Zophar, 490b, first speech and Job's reply,
493-5, second speech and Job's reply, 498
Zorah, 369a
Zoroaster, 389a, star legend, 1382a
Zwingli and Bible, 945a

